which, if neglected, soon leads to serious diseases. Simmons Liver Regulator exerts a most felicitous influence over every kind of biliousness. It restores the Liver to proper working order, regulates the secretion of bile and puts the digestive organs in such condition that they can do their best work. After taking this medicine no one will say, "I am bilious."

"I have been subject to severe spells of Congestion of the Liver, and have been in the habit of taking from 15 to 20 grains of calomel which generally laid me up for three or four days. Lately I have been taking Simmons Liver Regulator, which gave me relief without any interruption to business."—J. HUGG, Middleport, Ohio.

HIS LAST.

[George Alfred Townsend in American Home Journal.]

Some years ago, when marriage licenses had to be paid for, the Marylanders and Virginians rode across the narrow frontier in the valley and were married for nothing in Pennsylvania. Of course, they gave something to the preacher for his trouble. The consequence was that all the preachers on the Maryland side of the line became as lean as geese, and the preachers across the line in Pennsylvania grew as fat as turkey gobblers. But there was one preacher near Waynesboro, who did not grow fat. Garrick Howton, who did the largest business, became leaner and leaner the faster he married people. He was so lean, the people said, to enjoy life like a good Methodist, itinerant or a rubicund priest. No chicken coops were agitated at his approach. No little pigs squealed and got under their anxious mammas when Garrick aned over the sty and surveyed them.

Noddy knew just what sect or church Garrick belonged to there where everybody was his own theologian.

He ciled his church The Zionskites all was the only one of it—the bishop itself—except his son, Weasley Howton, whom he called "the deacon."

The church building did not exist, though ranches of the Zionskite body were said to be "furder west" by both the bishop and the deacon.

Inquisitive people hinted that there never would have been as many as two Zionskites except for the fat marriage fees which were to be had along Mason and Dixon's line; and that Bishop Garrick Howton only ordained his son Weasley into the priesthood reluctantly that he might occasionaly take some recreation himself and not miss any runaway couples which should arrive between midnight and morning.

All people far or near understood that the Howtons would marry anybody, the delivery of the certificate being conditional on the payment of the fee, and pains were taken to impress strangers that in The Zionskites discipline the certificate was a part of the ceremony itself.

A story was started and grew that old Howton married children tor the sake of his fees.

This story came up from sorrowing and broken-hearted parents in Virginia and from the rich manors and hamlets of Frederick in Maryland. The Pennsylvanians never verified these reports because it was none of their business.

That was the golden age, when the people of every state did to the people of every other state just what they pleased, and the boundary line made outrage justice or simplicity criminal.

Nobody crossed the line to call Bishop Howton to account. All licensed clergymen could marry; the bishop had a license signed by the deacon, his son, and the son had a license signed by the bishop of "The Zionskite Purified Order, Garrick Howton, First Temple-fungus."

If any preacher of a large church dared to inquire into the subject he was told that there had been a "laying on of hands," and this sent him to the right-about, to be followed by the cruel insinuation that his sole motive in questioning "liberty of conscience" had been envy and covetousness of Bishop Howton's marriage fees.

Still, that idea of marrying children to designing men had a bad sound. It gave a superstitious name to Bishop Howton's "parsonage." The runaway slaves from the old slave states knew and avoided that house, for they remembered how little Missy This or That had been spirited away by a reckless cousin or a designing overseer and made a wife in her early teens by "dat bad ole Bishop Howton."

If we could only get at him!" was muttered in many a proud, awed, humiliated homestead along the Shenandoah or Monocacy.

But they could not get at him for the same reason he could not get at them nor interfere with their privileges and abuses. We had no common country; we were inviolable states secure in our own venerable violations.

As times advanced Bishop Howton became a widower, and his mind was set on marrying again.

It may have been the example of marrying children under age, torn from their parents by their own disobedient impulses or the powerful sinister influence of man, or it may have been the childish beauty of Eunice Howton, his distant relative, which doomed her to become the bishop's wife when she should be old enough to receive his orders and not bring the laws of Pennsylvania down upon his head. The bishop bided his time.

Eunice was hardly fifteen, a slender, gray-eyed blonde, whose feet, touch the ground as they would, turned into lines of grace, and music seemed to be playing as she walked or moved, to such harmonies did she bend; while in the action of her head upon her delicate neck and even in the motion of her lips there appeared to be violin music whistled by her spirit as the upland zephyrs played upon it and her heart desired to dance.

The country people said that this was because her mother had been an actress and a dancer.

Somewhere back in the undiscerned past and vagueness of a larger world it was said that Bishop Howton had been a show manager and that his orphan cousin had married a French dancer who was in his strolling company.

This cousin had been left to Garrick, who had kept him down and nearly starved him, repressing his spirits by an avarice and superstition which lay across each other, and finally retired Garrick from the show business a complete failure, whilst his ward, set free by matrimony, made a nice little fortune keeping a dancing academy with his wife.

When the parents died something of the husband's inherited tenets caused him to repent, though he had never done anything bad, and in the weakness of dying he gave his child to his relative to be her trustee of a respectable little fortune.

The poor dancing teacher thought the word "bishop" covered a regenerate heart.

The bishop was merely a capitalist in marriage fees.

Some of the schoolboys called him Old Yoke fi-noki, because he yoked so many couples.

What education he had picked up avarice and illiterate associations had chased out of his head; like an old country Dutchman, he could spell joists for his barn joyce and talk about the breechman on his horse when he meant breeching.

This is considered reasonable humility.

As time advanced Garrick grew deeply in love with Eunice, and forgot to give spiritual restraint to his son.

"At seventeen sharp," old Garrick Howton often repeated to himself, looking at Eunice with the threefold passions of love and superstition.

Often when an old man falls in love it seems to him like holiness, when it is only foolishness.

In that way Garrick threw himself back into his natural state, before he became an avaricious scoundrel or a self-frightened hypocrite. He got to believing in the religion he practiced upon. He feared night solitude and ghosts. He believed that his monstrous passion was a sacrifice on his part for the sake of securing Eunice's soul.

"I should be the devil's prize without her," mused Garrick Howton. "The children I have tied in wedlocks of despair, the unformed souls I have manacled to selfish fiends, the headstrong schoolgirls I have made the legal slaves of hideous skinflints, and who have in a few months awakened to everlasting repentence and horror, would troop into my lonely home amongst these mountains and drive me crazy with their curses. I shall go mad! But Eunice, Eunice, she will guard my door and warm my heart and bring other angels like her from heaven to my relief."

It was plain the bishop was becoming slightly hysterical.

Weasley Howton had become notified by his father that he must go West and establish his own congregation of the Zionskites.

He was sent to the garret to study the discipline and scriptures.

One day Eunice stole up into the garrett, while the bishop was marrying a one-eyed man of sixty to a mountain maid of eighteen, and she met a different scene there from the penance and prayer she had expected.

Weasley was rigged out in a suit of theatrical clothes taken from Eunice's parent's trunks, and was executing a jig.

The bishop had told Eunice that in the said trunks was the devil's wardrobe. The young people locked the door and examined it.

What places are garretts for rain and love! How it drops upon the roof! How it goes pit-a-pat in the heart! How the heart is raining suddenly through the eyes and the roof is beating with the palpitation of the wind!

Old men seldom go to garrets. Bad old men like Garrick Howton never do.

Next week Weasley Howton was to start for Indiana, and be an apostle on the Wabash.

His trunk was packed and his ticket for the stage was to be paid for over the great National road from Hagerstown.

"Fifty dollars fare!" exclaimed the bishop, as he walked his upper porch, "what a sum of money! But the next week it shall be made up out of Eunice's fortune, which will then be mine, with her fadeless beauty, till death do us part."

As he looked there came a cloud of dust up the Leitersburg road from the South, where somebody was driving hard.

"It looks like a runaway couple," exclaimed Garrick Howton, reaching for his eye-glasses. But the shade of the North mountains, where the sun was going down, put a belt of blackness upon the landscape, like the moon's total eclipse. When the sound of the wheels came to the door and Garrick heard a knock, he descended and found a strange man in the parlor, which had no lights.

"Sare," the stranger said, "I have ze honair to say zat I am in love. But ze lady is too leetle; she haf not ze grand age. It will be all ze same; because she loves me and her fathair have so much shame he nevair will say nothing. I give you fifty dollaire to make me her husband."

"Fifty dollars!" the bishop's avaricious heart responded. "It is Weasley's whole fare, The good demon must have sent this man here."

Then the business piety returning, the bishop spoke aloud:

"What are the names of the parties? Marriage, my brother, the apostle says, is honorable in all—Hebrews xiii, 4. I see not that it may not be honorable in thee."

"Ze names are on certificates we have filled. Ze fee I pay you is extraordinary, monsieur. For ze fifty dollaire we make two demands: Au premiere, zat you marry ze bride veiled! Au seconde, zat you sign two certificates for us, to protect ze lady and moi meme."

"The age of the bride?" asked Garrick Howton,

"What mattair zat? You have made many ze wife at fourteen, many a time. My bride is sixteen. Come, ze money.

He felt the bankbill in his hand and it dried up his compunctions of heart; he felt a quill put in his fingers and the stranger, with something like a fusee, made a flame that contained brimstone and seemed yellow and blue.

"Eternally be mine, as zis papair you sign," the strange man exclaimed—"I mean ze lady child, 'ze lady, parbleu."

The voice had a deep sepulchral tone in it, and by the foreboding flame, Garrick saw a person whose forehead was all in patches, with French moustaches under his nose and blackened eyebrows drawn nearly through the temples to the edge of a colorless inky wig.

'You must give me some name," spoke the bishop, as he signed, "although I cannot read by such a light."

"I am ze Marquis Bellsbub."

"Bring in the lady!"

Low laughter seemed to be circling around the apartment as the uniting words were said by the bishop's faltering tongue.

Loud laughter broke from the carriage windows as the scoundrel drove away.

"Here, Weasley! Eunice! Lights! Lights!" exclaimed old Garrick Howtan. "I have got my last marriage fee."

No voice replied; the dark mountains through the windows showed bridal wreaths of stars upon their forbidding brows, like the awful presence of the marquis who had but now departed with childhood's purity in his false black eyes and wig.

The bishop took fire and lighted a candle. He saw a paper lying upon the floor with his signature to it. He read with horror that he acknowledged the sale of his soul to Beelzebub for a thousand years.

"Ha! ha!" he cried, "Satan has dropped the contract he entrapped me to sign. To the fire—to the fire with it!"

A voice seemed to sound from the garrett on the wailing of the wind:

"You signed two such certificates. You have married Eunice to the devil!"

"Father," cried Weasley Howton next morning, "Eunice is not to be found. Will you forgive her if she has married—if she has married me?"

Bishop Howton lay on the floor dead.

OAKLAND, GARRETT CO., MD.

THE HOUSE OF HATE.

Mine enemy builded well, with the soft blue hills in sight;
But betwixt his house and the hills I builded a house for spite;
And the name thereof I set in stone-work over the gate,
With a carving of bats and apes; and I called it
The House of Hate.

And the front was alive with masks of malice
and of despair,
Horned demons that leered in stone, and women with serpent hair;
That, whenever his glance would rest on the soft hills far and blue,
It must fall on mine evil work, and my hatred should pierce him through.

And I said: "I will dwell herein, for beholding my heart's desire
On my foe," and I knelt, and fain had brightened
the hearth with fire;
But the brands they would hiss and die, as with curses a strangled man,
And the hearth was cold from the hour that the House of Hate began.

And I called with a voice of power: "Make ye merry, all friends of mine,
In the hall of my House of Hate, where is plentiful store, and wine;
We will drink unhealth together unto him I have foiled and fooled!"
And they stared and they passed me by; but I scorned to be thereby schooled.

And I ordered my board for feast, and I drank in the topmost seat
Choice grape from a curious cup; and the first it was wonder-sweet;
But the second was bitter indeed, and the third was bitter and black,
And the gloom of the grave came on me, and I cast the cup to wrack.

Alone, I was stark alone, and the shadows were each a fear,
And thinly I laughed, but once, for the echoes were strange to hear.
And the wind on the stairway howled, as a green-eyed wolf might cry;
And I heard my heart: I must look on the face of a man, or die!

So I crept to my mirrored face, and I looked,
and I saw it grown
(By the light in my shaking hand) to the like
of the masks of stone;
And with horror I shrieked aloud as I flung my torch and fled;
And a fire-snake writhed where it fell, and at midnight the sky was red.

And at morn, when the House of Hate was a ruin, despoiled of flame,
I fell at mine enemy's feet, and besought him to slay my shame,
But he looked in mine eyes and smiled, and his eyes were calm and great:
"You rave, or have dreamed," he said: "I saw not your House of Hate!"

OLD MR. NICKLEPOD.

How He Provided for Flossie's Wedding Dowry.

"I haven't the slightest objection to Jack, my dear, and when he has saved money enough to provide for you in case of sickness or misfortune, I will gladly give my consent to your marriage."

"How much money, papa?"

"Really, Flossie, you are incorrigible. Say five thousand dollars."

"And that, with his present salary, would take five years at least."

"And you would have reached the advanced age of twenty-three."

"Pretty old, papa."

"Yes, in the neighborhood of 'the sere and yellow.'"

"I've a good mind to marry Mr. Nicklepod."

"Excellent idea. He would doubtless settle a million on you, and be accommodating enough to die in a month or two."

"He's most old enough to die, isn't he!"

Judge Somerton looked up from his pile of papers, and gave his daughter's speaking countenance a quick examination. There was something in her manner of asking this question a little different from usual, and the judge was an expert in detecting shades of this kind.

"Mr. Nicklepod told me one day that he would give any thing if he could have me about his house all the time," the girl went on, half laughing and half pouting.

"You would make a splendid trumpeter, Floss."

The judge's suspicions were quite allayed now, and the easiest way out of these annoying love complications was to treat the matter as lightly as possible.

"O, my lungs are good," said Flossie; "and I wouldn't mind singing into the trumpet. Papa Somerton, what a lark! Think of how many edifying things I could say with my back to the poor old gentleman. I could abuse him to all the furniture in the house, and he'd never be the wiser. I'll consider it, papa."

"When a woman considers, she is generally safe."

At this point the judge resumed his search among the intricacies of chirography, and his daughter went on with her dusting and putting to rights. After awhile the silence was again broken by the latter.

"You were poor when you married, papa?"

"As a church mouse, Flossie."

"Why did you do it?"

"Because I didn't know any better."

"But you and mamma were very happy."

"Florence," and now the kindly, middle-aged man brought his hand down hard upon his desk, "if I had waited until I had saved some money your mother would be alive now. It was hardship and poverty that sowed the seeds of a fatal disease. In three years, Flossie, there were two children born to us. My salary was quite inadequate for all the added expenses. Then came frettings and heartaches, and a six-months' illness of my own. We suffered as none can understand save those who have had similar experiences. Your mother was eighteen, Flossie. She should not have married at that age. Our love was all right, but our marriage at that time was a fatal mistake. Now you know why I advise you as I do."

Long after the judge had left the house the saddening effect of his words remained, but youth is unable to remain very long in the shadow of another's grief, and so after awhile Miss Florence doffed her sweeping-cap, put away her sad thoughts, and went out into the garden. It was a warm April day, and shrubs and grass were responding in their brightest manner to Nature's caressing invitation. Such a day was too much for Flossie. She could scarcely have been sad under any provocation, but a look at the bright, sunny face and sparkling brown eyes was enough to convince one that the spirit of mischief was exceedingly strong within her. Her coquettish garden hat was posed at the exact angle for becomingness, and her plump little figure, arrayed in a dress she had cut and made with her own fair hands, was one to be looked after and admired by every lover of harmony. There was a gate leading from the judge's garden to that of his millionaire neighbor, the latter being possessed of that genial and generous disposition which likes to share its pleasures with others. Mr. Nicklepod, who was fond of working with his flowers, spent much of his time in his large hothouses, and thither the young woman, humming and smiling, betook herself. Mr. Nicklepod's ear-trumpet reposed by the side of a bed of carnation-pinks, while its owner busied himself with some orange-trees further on.

"I wonder how long I could stand it to yell into an ear-trumpet!" the visitor soliloquized. "Of course I could hide it when I didn't feel like talking. But then I suppose he'd be making signs and faces at me, and I should have to make faces and signs at him, and that would be worse than the trumpet." With this the judge's daughter seized the somewhat formidable-looking instrument and went to meet her friend.

"Why, Blossom, good-morning," said the millionaire, heartily. "Nobody but you ever thinks to bring me my trumpet."

"And nobody but me would ever think of hypothecating your trumpet," said the naughty girl, under her breath.

"Quite well, but a little cross," said Florence, bending over the "porringer" as she called it. "I hope you are not cross, Mr. Nicklepod?"

The smile deepened about the girl's mouth as she wondered what must have been her expression of countenance when giving utterance to these words. She felt it to be the most designing speech of her life.

"Cross with you!" protested the old man, gallantly; "impossible. I can't believe the judge is ever cross, Blossom; but if he is, you can run right away to my house any time, and you shall have any thing you want as long as you live."

"I seem to be traveling by lightning express, and on the locomotive at that," said the minx, sotto voce. "But what would papa do?" she asked of the trumpet.

"You will be leaving him some time, I suppose, Blossom?"

"Yes, in about fifty years," said the girl to herself.

"And you see, child," Mr. Nicklepod went on, "it would be very handy for your pa if he only had to come next door to see you."

"I never thought of that," said Flossie; "and I guess I'll come," she said aloud, and then to herself; "I wish I dared ask him how long he thinks he is going to live."

"I've a good mind to take you at your word, Blossom. I'm a pretty old man, but hearty yet, and there is one thing I haven't forgot, and that's how to treat women folks. I'm a very lonesome old duffer, too, with all my money, child.

"The back gate would be real convenient for papa, wouldn't it?" said Flossie into the trumpet, and in a tone which was just on the edge of a sob. "But by what gate could Jack come in?" was the next thought, and now the sob was softly shattered, and the April tears fell in a blinding mist.

"Blossom, what's the matter?" said the old man, with real concern. "It can't be possible that the judge has really been cross enough to make you cry?"

"O, no, indeed!" said Flossie. "I was thinking how nice it would be to have all the flowers I wanted."

"You could have had those at any time," was the somewhat disconcerted response.

"Yes, Mr. Nicklepod"—Flossie was determined to be honest even in the hour of her greatest deceit—"and all the money."

The seamed and wrinkled face took on a grave expression, and the old head shook a little at the mention of this word.

"Money isn't every thing, Blossom," he said. "Money won't provide me with ears, or keep the rheumatism out of my knees, or the loneliness from my heart. But you shall have money. Now go and tell John to cut all the flowers you want, and then run home and tell your pa of my offer. I think you had both bettter come in and take dinner with me to-night, and we'll talk it all over."

"He doesn't act particularly hilarious, seems to me," said Flossie, as she turned away. "But I'm engaged, anyway—plighted to an octogenarian, or a centurian, or something of that kind. Jack'll hate me, of course; but when he finds I have done it for his sake he'll have to relent. If I don't have but a million, that will be better than scraping and twisting for years to save five thousand dollars. Papa always said that riches would be very becoming to me. Poor papa! Poor Jack!"

When the judge returned to his home, about three o'clock that afternoon, he was much surprised to find his daughter reclining upon the library-lounge with her head tied up.

"What's the matter, Flossie? What is it smells so?"

"Vinegar, papa. I've had hysterics, and this is the reaction."

"I hope you are not getting cranky, and weak, and nervous, like the girl of the period, Floss."

"I am not getting any thing, papa; I've got—I've got all I want, and more than I want; and nothing that I want. I've got old Mr. Nicklepod and his car-trumpet for my future husband, papa, and there's millions in it; but where—oh, where is Jack?"

For a moment the judge stood as if petrified, and then burst into a perfect torrent of laughter. At this point the vinegar bandage was discarded, and the prospective millionairess came to a sitting position.

"Isn't it funny? Isn't it very funny?" she remarked, with flashing eyes. "But you are responsible for it, with your talk about five thousand dollars. I went deliberately into Mr. Nicklepod's, and made him propose to me. I was bound to settle it to-day. And now, papa, will you break the news to Jack? We are to dine with the ear-trumpet to-night, and then exeunt parties and dances, with Jack so handsome and lovely in his full-dress suit, and enter long-sleeved gowns and old age without ears."

"You'll have ears enough for both," said the judge. "They seem to have grown longer since morning."

"But, papa, Mr. Nicklepod is certainly over eighty, isn't he?"

"Flossie, what have you been doing?"

"Truly, papa, just what I said. O, dear me, how my head aches. Mercy! how my heart aches!"

"Upon my word I thought better of Nicklepod," said the judge to himself awhile afterwards. "But I pity the man—young, old or middle-aged—who gets my Floss!" and then the judge laughed again, though there was a touch of something besides merriment in his heart.

That evening the millionaire was at his best. Carefully dressed and "valeted," as Flossie remarked, he looked much younger than when in his garden or on the street.

"Good for forty years, I should say, Floss," whispered the judge, wickedly.

"He is real handsome," was the astonishing reply, "and I shall live to be proud of him."

"I suppose Blossom has told you of our compact," Mr. Nicklepod began, when at dessert, the servants having left the dining-room.

The judge nodded, the ear-trumpet being on Flossie's side.

"Are you agreed?" was the next direct question put by the old gentleman.

"Nod up and down," said Flossie. "Don't you dare do it sideways."

The judge reached for the trumpet and yelled into it:

"We'll talk about that later."

"Very well," said Mr. Nicklepod; "I am, as I told Blossom, an old man, and perhaps not very good company; but I know how to treat women folks—let 'em have their liberty, and give them plenty of money—eh!" and now the millionaire's face was fairly radiant.

"That ought to be satisfactory," said the judge; "but there are those who would abuse such broad privileges—and one of them is not so very far off, either," he added under his breath.

"Perhaps! but Blossom wouldn't be one of that kind. No, indeed; I am sure of Blossom."

The judge shook his head "sideways" that time. It seemed an involuntary movement.

"Can't you circumlocute to how old he is, papa?" said naughty Flossie.

"I was telling Neighbor Davis this morning," the host began as if in answer to her question, "that I really look older than I am, being only seventy-two last week."

"You are in for it," the judge remarked, as the speaker paused a moment to fill his glass. "Feel of your ears, Floss, and learn for yourself if they haven't grown."

"My father," Mr. Nicklepod resumed, "lived to be ninety-six, and then died from an accident. My mother was in her ninetieth year when she passed away. In fact, we are a very long-lived race, though we seem to age early."

"According to precedent, twenty years at least," said the judge.

"The reason I haven't married again," the millionaire went on, "is because I could never bring myself to believe that anyone whom I cared for could ever care for me; and to have a wife whose constant wish was for my death would be rather hard lines—eh, Blossom?"

"Blossom" managed to nod her head but her face was turned away from her host, and her father was surprised to see how red it was.

"Why, are you like Cæsar's wife?" the latter managed to ask, in his old jokingmanner. If Flossie lost her grip at this crisis the consequences would be more dramatic than he cared to contemplate. But apply the change from the dining-room to the beautiful library caused a change in the conversation, and the victim of her own folly had a chance to recover herself. It was a long, strange evening, and one to be remembered while life lasted. The two men played checkers, while the girl guest wandered about among the books and pictures, stealing occasionally into the great drawing-rooms, and coming back again all white and scared as if she had seen a ghost.

"Will it be lonely for you, Blossom?" the old gentleman asked, as she returned from one of these excursions. "I've been thinking," he added, without waiting for an answer, "that it'll make things about right if I can persuade your pa to come, too. He has no one but you, and then I need some business help, and it would be a heartening thing to have a true friend's hand."

"O, dear! he is going to marry us both," muttered Flossie.

"What do you say, judge?" Mr. Nicklepod went on. "Suppose you try it for a year? There is no reason why this house can not be a home to you both in the truest sense of the word. Do take pity on my neighbors, for I believe I am the lonesomest old vagabond in the whole world."

"Judge Somerton, I wish I was dead," said Flossie; and then, seizing the trumpet, she said, in broken tones: "Mr. Nicklepod you are an old angel, and papa don't know what to say, and I am in just a bad a state. I'd love to live here with all these beautiful things, and with you, so kind and generous, and so would papa—that is, if he has a single sense left. And I made up my mind I would live here just because I loved Jack—you know Jack—and he hadn't any money, and he couldn't marry me it about ten ages."

"For mercy's sake, Floss," the judge put in, imploringly, "don't be a simpleton."

"It's begun, and it has got to come," was the girl's quick answer. "And, Mr. Nicklepod, I thought some time I could take Jack a lot of money—that is, if he would wait for me—and I didn't see how I could really do you any harm—that is, if you were truly fond of me."

"You are an honest, blessed girl," said the old man, brushing away a tear, "and I am truly fond of you, and truly desirous to promote your best interests. But, Blossom, I would no sooner marry you than I would kill you. Such a wicked thought has never crossed my mind. You shall have two fathers, Blossom, and you shall have Jack, too; but not to marry him now, because you are not old enough, and Jack hasn't had a chance to show what kind of stuff there is in him yet. Five years from now, if he proves worthy, you shall go to him with a dowry. Then we will have the jolliest wedding that ever was, and I will dance with the bride."

For a moment there was utter silence in the room, and then Flossie lifted her right hand, and with a characteristic movement of her little forefinger, said into the trumpet:

"You two men have had your heads together. That is as plain as the nose on your face," giving her father's nasal organ a little tweak. "But, Papa Nicklepod, Judge Somerton and his daughter will be with you anon, and the way you will have to stand round and mind the housekeeper will be a caution."

"All right," said Mr. Nicklepod; "give me a kiss; and I do wish I could tell you how happy you have made me!"

The kiss was given, and it was no disgrace to Flossie that her eyes overflowed with tears.—Eleanor Kirk, in Leslie's Weekly.

HOW TO GROW MELONS.

Description of a Most Successful Method of Cultivation.

Select a plot of moderately rich land, old meadow or newly-cleared preferred, inclining slightly to the east. Break deep and harrow thoroughly; furrow eight feet each way, by throwing the soil in opposite directions with a heavy breaking-plow, making a deep furrow. At the intersection of the cross-furrows make the hills, with a compost of half a peck of hen droppings and one bushel of well-rotted manure, rounded up with earth from the sides of the furrows. Into these plant three or four seed, after they have been soaked three days in warm water containing a tablespoonful of chloride of lime and a few drops of carbolic acid. Neither striped bugs nor mice will ever molest seed after this preparation.

As soon as the plants have begun fairly to run, take the same plow and throw the furrows toward the one that contains the hills. In a week or ten days do the same thing crossways, and two weeks later complete the plowing where the first was done, leaving a deep furrow for drainage, and two weeks later complete it the other way, leaving the vines on a beautiful rounded mound, with deeply and freshly-stirred soil under and all around them, needing nothing but just enough hoeing to keep intruding weeds down to warrant the lovers of melons to gather an abundant crop, which will be as sure to come as the sun shines, as neither the extremes of wet nor dry weather will disturb it. Cucumbers can be treated in the same way most successfully.—S. D. Ingham, in Cincinnati Commercial.

THE MODERN OFFICE-BOY.

A Being of Transcendent Importance and Unmitigated Gall.

Can it be that this pachyderm, this swaggering hobbledehoy, this pestilential, noisy nuisance, is the same boy who, a few months back, came into the office a sensitive, bashful, quiet and unobstrusive creature? Yes, he is the same in one sense, but in another he is an entirely different personage.

In the early days of his sojourn among us, he used to doff his hat ere he entered the door; he never spoke unless spoken to, and when he was addressed he blushed like the red, red rose, and and answered with fear and trembling, although he never forgot his "Yes, sir," and his "No, sir." In a word, he was all that an office-boy should be.

But how is he now? Quite the reverse. When he now comes in, it is in a breezy, boisterous manner, with his hat reposing jauntily on one ear, and he would be whistling were it not for the cigarette which parts his lips and prevents their puckering. He is affability itself, and he greets all alike with an easy, devil-may-care indifference that is really charming. He makes no invidious distinction against the men of mature years, but addresses them with the same sang froid and sprightliness that is accorded to those of tender years.

His voice is seldom still. Indeed, it is generally held that it goes on, like Tennyson's brook, forever. It is never dull where he is. He can (at least, he does) talk on any subject, and he never waits for others to start topics for conversation. He inevitably takes the initiative, and whatever subject he condescends to treat, he approaches it with an easy confidence that is most engaging, and he is never floored by it, however potential it may be in the opinion of people who have been made cautious by the weight of years.

And then his conversation is so inspiring? It is made up of the most recherche slang; it contains the very latest echoes from the prize ring and the base ball field, and it discovers a familiarity with the esoteric life of theatrical people which is wonderful in its comprehensiveness, as well as in its freedom in the matter of detail.

He naturally looks down upon the people in the office, although he tries to hide his contempt—remembering, no doubt, that if he shall be spared, he will probably become as big a fool as the average human being of mature years—and by his easy familiarity and touch-and-go affability he succeeds—or ought to succeed—in making everybody feel comfortable and contented.

And then his personal relations are so interesting! He covers up nothing, but freely tells to all the story of his adventures of the previous evening, together with full particulars in regard to such engrossing matters as the number of cigarettes he has burned within the last twenty-four hours, and the quantity of tobacco he has masticated, and he never fails to mention, with becoming pride, that glass of beer which he tossed off last night, with manly nonchalance, in some third-rate basement saloon. He is, in short, so frank and ingenuous that, but for the fact that such a thought were treason to his abounding good nature, one might suspect that he told these things merely out of a spirit of boastfulness, or with a desire to instil envy in the hearts of his auditors; but clearly this can not be. It is, on the contrary, from a wish to improve others and instruct them in the ways of the gay world that he takes so much pains to detail his achievements.

And this is all the more kind in him because of the fact that the burden of the affairs of the office weigh upon him with unfair heaviness, for it is known to him, even though it be unsuspected by the others, that without his intrusive oversight nothing could go rightly, or indeed go at all. But spite of the cares which press upon him so weightily, he still finds time to instruct and give counsel to those who, being older than he, have presumably forgotten all they ever knew; admitting that they ever did know any thing.

The office boy, as he now is, is, in brief, a rare blessing, and when one reflects upon what he was, and sees how he has developed, one can not be too thankful for the privilege of associating with a being of such transcendent importance. The only fear that presses upon the mind is that he may be cut off in the flower of his youth, or grow too big for his unmentionables.

But he is a daisy.—Boston Transcript.

Five Ways to Cure a Cold.

1. Bathe the feet in hot water, and drink a pint of hot lemonade. Then sponge with salt water and remain in a warm room.
2. Bathe the face in very hot water every five minutes for an hour.
3. Snuff up the nostrils hot salt water every three hours.
4. Inhale ammonia or menthol.
5. Take four hours' active exercise in the open air.

Summer colds are the worst of all colds oftentimes, as it is then very difficult to protect one's self properly. A ten grain dose of quinine will usually break up a cold in the beginning. THE BAD RED DOG.

He Starts a Fight and Then Runs Away Like a Coward.

There were seven or eight boys and a dog fight in an alley off Second street yesterday as a policeman happened along, and after clubbing the dogs apart he said to the largest boy:

"Now, then, I want to know all about this."

"Well, you know," replied the boy, "I was coming up the alley with my spotted dog. That boy there was coming down the alley with his black dog."

"And you knew the dogs would fight, of course."

"O, no, sir. When we came up to each other the dogs began to play. We were talking about going a-fishing, when that boy over there came along with a little red dog."

"Where is it?"

"Run away, sir. His red dog began to pick a fight with my dog, and then the black pitched in. This let the red dog out, and away he went."

"But why didn't you separate them?"

"Then who'd get the money?"

"Money! So you had money up?"

"Why, after they got to fighting each of us bet on our own dog, of course."

"Then I want——!"

But he didn't get one of them, and while he halted at one end of the alley to breathe after his run the mob appeared at the other and the referee announced:

MOSE'S DILEMMA.

A Dealer in Umbrellas Explains Why He Objects to Rainy Weather.

The rain was coming down by the barrelful as Gilhooly stepped into Mose Schaumburg's store. Mose wore a very gloomy look.

"Why, Mose, what makes you look so blue?"

"No wonder I looks plue, Mishter Gilhooly. It rains so much all de dimes and I has got a pig stock of umbrellas on hand."

"I should think that the rainy weather would be the very time you would sell more umbrellas than at any other time. I should suppose that rainy weather would be the very time for you 'to make hay while the sun shines,' so to speak."

"No, sir; dot vas a great mistake. You see it rains so steady dot peebles can't put their umbrellas long enough down for them to be stolen."

"Well?"

"Vell, don't you see, if de peebles don't put down dose umprellas on the corner der vas no umprellas stolen, den der vas no new ones pought."

Just at this moment the sun shone out from behind a cloud, and its rays fell on the head of the smiling Israelite, who looked like one of the pictures of a saint with a beatific smile, and a halo about his head by one of the old masters.—Texas Siftings.

System in Housekeeping.

More depends upon system in housekeeping than many people know. In order to have a well-kept house the mistress must be orderly and methodical. These qualities do not come naturally to all, but watchfulness and constant effort will make them possible even where they are foreign to one's nature. I know a woman who, being well aware of her deficiencies in this respect, wrote out a list of daily work for herself, with the order in which certain daily tasks should be performed. Of course there was the liability to interruptions, but she was satisfied that her plan saved time, labor and worry.—Good Cheer.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—The peach trees that were planted last spring should be properly shaped with the shears. The first year is the most important one for trimming the trees, as any injury received will be permanent.

—A churn should be scalded with boiling water, made alkaline with washing soda. Every particle of milk or cream should be removed. After being well washed the churn should be rinsed by again using boiling water. The work can not be too carefully done.

—Pigs should be weaned gradually, and have to be taught to eat before they are weaned. Give them a trough where the sow can not reach it and furnish a little food four times daily, consisting of a mixture of bran, ground oats and corn meal, scalded in hot water.—Farm and Home.

—Curried Veal: Fry four or five onions in two ounces of butter. Rub two spoonsful of curry powder over a pound and a half of veal cutlets, and fry in butter; add the fried onions, a pint of hot milk, a pinch of salt, and two or three cloves; stew gently until the liquor is boiled low. Just before serving add the juice of half a lemon.

—Ten dollar's worth of tilling may redeem some swamps that will be worth a hundred dollars a year afterward. A few days' work straightening up a water course may give the use of an acre or two of better land than can be found elsewhere on the place, which has previously been occupied by the bed of some winding stream.

—Fish Pie: Take any firm-fleshed fish, cut in slices, and season with salt and pepper; let stand in a cold place for two or three hours, then put the sliced fish in a baking dish, with a little cream or water, and butter and flour rubbed to a cream, with minced parsley and hard-boiled eggs sliced; line the sides of the dish half way down, and cover with a nice paste. Bake in an oven, quick at first, but gradually growing moderate.

—If the horse is not at extra fast or hard work, it is best to pasture it when convenient through the growing weather, unless flies and mosquitoes are quite annoying; then it should be stabled during the day and turned out during the night. If the grass is abundant and of a good quality, the horse will eat enough during this time to support it well, with the addition of hay and a few quarts of meal at noon in the stable.

—The remedy for pear blight consists of one part of sulphur to five parts of lime, with a small amount of carbolic acid added. Sufficient water is used to make a thin whitewash. This mixture should be sprayed upon the trees at intervals during the season, commencing as soon as the leaves appear. An application shonld be made at the time the trees come into blossom.

THE POULTRY BUSINESS.

Certain General Rules to Be Observed by Those Engaged in It.

The interest in poultry is increasing in this section of the country, and as it becomes better understood is one of our most important branches of farm production. No business on the farm has been so fluctuating. There are in this section many abandoned poultry houses that have cost their owners many hundreds of dollars each, yet there are others who are erecting more sensible houses and who are more certain of success.

There is something queer about this poultry industry. When a man keeps a little brood of fowls, say ten or twelve, and makes them profitable, he thinks he can increase his brood to one hundred or two hundred with equal profit. His reasoning seems perfectly logical. If ten fowls will pay a net profit of $1.50 apiece annually, why should not 100 fowls pay $150, and 1,000 fowls pay $1,500 annually? Whatever the figures are, however, these large broods do not pay the same proportionate profit as the smaller ones.

The trouble consists in supposing that 1,000 fowls can be made as profitable in proportion as ten, and perhaps they could if one would give them the same care, the same room and range, and the same relative feed. The ordinary poultry keeper will not do this unless he makes it his business to attend to his poultry yards and houses as he would to any other branch of business. It requires intelligent management and extra care in every department to achieve success.

Thus if the beginner decides to take the fancy breeds and make his profit from the sale of fancy birds, that is one thing. If he decides to take some standard variety, and depend on the value of eggs for hatching, that is another thing. Again, if he decides to raise chicks for broilers for the early market, he must make his arrangements accordingly; and finally, if he decides to raise poultry and eggs for the general market and for family use, he must select his fowls and arrange their quarters with that intent.

Whichever branch of the business one may take up, there are certain general rules to be observed. The three essentials are pure air, pure water and proper food. There is no animal that will pollute ten cubic feet of pure air as rapidly as a full-grown fowl. There is no animal that needs so much pure water according to its size, and there is no feature which excites so much discussion as the proper food for fowls.

For the first four weeks the young chicks need but very little food, and that should consist of bread-crumbs or crushed crackers, boiled eggs or boiled eggs or boiled rice, and this should be given sparingly. Many a fine brood of young chicks has been killed by kindness or over-feeding. After the fourth or fifth week there is no better feed for a regular diet than the whole grain of every variety. In cold winter weather a hot mash in the morning is beneficial, especially for laying fowl.—Boston Budget.

RIGHTS AND DUTIES.

The Importance of Using One's Privileges to the Best Good of Society.

The truth that every new right secured involves new obligations and new duties needs much more emphasis than it at present receives. The desire to gain rights is strong enough and sufficiently manifested, but the desire to fulfill worthily the trusts they impose is comparatively weak. A man chained hand and foot is certainly deprived of the right of free motion, and justly demands release. But directly he is set free a multitude of duties and obligations spring up. Where shall he direct his steps? How shall he use his hands? What good thing is he to bring out of his liberty that was impossible before? If he uses his newly-found power only to abuse and maltreat his fellowmen, it may well be doubted whether, after all, his former state of restraint were not preferable. So with all other rights—free thought, free speech, free press, free labor—they are blessings in proportion as they are exercised for good; when they are used in the interests of selfishness and greed, or to destroy the rights of others, or to break down law and order, they cease to be benefactions, and if carried in such directions beyond certain limits society justly retracts the boon. Rights used in the cause of wrong certainly forfeit their claim to recognition, and render their very name an absurdity. It is time that more emphasis were laid upon moral obligation, both as between man and his fellow-man and between the man and the community. Too many people are developing a keen insight into what they suppose others owe them, while maintaining a dullness of perception truly alarming as to what they owe to others. Clamoring loudly for their own rights, they forget how many rightful claims of others they are constantly withholding. It is, of course, only the few extremely pronounced cases of this injustice with which the law can deal. By far the larger proportion are beyond the reach of law courts. The father of a family, claiming the right to order his own household, robs his children of the most sacred rights, and through avarice, or selfishness, or ill-humor, wrecks their happiness and prospects. Or an avaricious manufacturer, who claims the right to manage his own business without interference, so manages it that his workmen must labor at starvation wages, and his customers must pay full price for an adulterated article. Or the laborer eagerly claims his right to labor at pleasure, and to cease when he will, yet utterly disregards the same right of his fellow-laborer, and compels him, by threat and penalty, to abstain from working at his command. Thus, in the name of liberty, many an act of tyranny flourishes; in the name of freedom, many a feeble one becomes enslaved; in the name of human rights, many a man and woman is cruelly wronged; in the name of free speech, many a fair reputation is ruined, many falsehoods disseminated, many errors taught. What is needed among us more than the insistence of rights is the enforcement of duty. It should be impressed upon the minds and hearts of all that a right is not something merely to secure, to rejoice in, and to use at pleasure, but that it is a solemn trust to hold, an obligation to fulfill, a power to wield, a responsibility for which each who possesses it is accountable. The question so often asked: "Am I receiving all the rights to which I am entitled?" should be coupled with the more important and searching one: "Am I using all the rights with which I am invested for the best good of society? Am I giving to others all the rights which belong to them, as far as my power extends?" It is this attitude of mind which gives breath and dignity to life, and raises justice and generosity to their rightful places in society. Only as men live for something higher and nobler than self can they attain their true value, and only as this is done habitually by individuals can we hope to see an elevated and prosperous community. A movement in this direction is being made by the formation of societies, whose object is said to be "the dissemination of a knowledge of the principles of good citizenship and the promotion of the observance of the duties imposed thereby." We gladly welcome all such endeavors, hoping that their influence may be widely diffused and may help to place the whole doctrine of rights upon the firm and sure basis of righteousness.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Sensitiveness of Tea.

The extraordinary sensitiveness of tea to odors was shown in New York the other day. The ship brought a cargo of tea—and nothing else—from China, and, upon testing the tea, it was found to be sweet. The ship had brought a cargo of sugar from Manilla on the previous voyage, and though not a bit of it was left in the vessel, yet the odor was sufficient to impregnate the tea. A case somewhat similar to this occurred twelve years ago, when tea was packed in the same hold with camphor. It is known that butter will absorb odors equally as well. The odor of kerosene, for instance, and tobacco and vanilla beans, are fully as sensitive as any thing that is known to borrow odors.—Good Housekeeping.

—A Concord lady who recently sent fifty cents for a box of ribbons "warranted all silk," in answer to a Maine firm's glowing advertisement, received a small lot of worthless cotton ribbons and a printed card, which "added insult to injury" by the inscription: "Some folks expect the earth for ten cents."

A good many women who have married dry-goods clerks have got two yards of illusion as a premium.—Pittsburgh Chronicle.

The Blues.

This is a synonym for that gloomy, harrassed condition of the mind which has its origin in dyspepsia. All the ugly spirits that, under the name of the "blues," "blue devils," "megrims" and "mulligrubs" torments the dyspeptic almost ceaselessly, vanish when attacked with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, that, moreover, annihilates biliousness, constipation, chills and fever, kidney complaints and nervousness.

CATARRH IN THE HEAD.

SYMPTOMS OF THE DISEASE.—Dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; the eyes are weak; there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; the voice is changed and has a "nasal twang"; the breath is offensive; smell and taste impaired; there is a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility. Only a few of the above-named symptoms are likely to be present in any one case. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians.

COMMON SENSE TREATMENT. If you would remove an evil, strike at its root. As the predisposing or real cause of catarrh is, in the majority of cases, some weakness, impurity, or otherwise faulty condition of the system, in attempting to cure the disease our chief aim must be directed to the removal of that cause. The more we see of this odious disease, and we treat successfully thousands of cases annually at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, the more do we realize the importance of combining with the use of a local, soothing and healing application, a thorough and persistent internal use of blood-cleansing and tonic medicines.

CHIEF RELIANCE. In curing catarrh and all the various diseases with which it is so frequently complicated, as throat, bronchial, and lung diseases, weak stomach, catarrhal deafness, weak or inflamed eyes, impure blood, scrofulous and syphilitic taints, the wonderful powers and virtues of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cannot be too strongly extolled. It has a specific effect upon the lining mucous membranes of the nasal and other air-passages, promoting the natural secretion of their follicles and glands, thereby softening the diseased and thickened membrane, and restoring it to its natural, thin, delicate, moist, healthy condition. As a blood-purifier, it is unsurpassed. As these diseases which complicate catarrh are diseases of the lining mucous membrance, or of the blood, it will readily be seen why this medicine is so well calculated to cure them.

LOCAL AGENT. As a local application for healing the diseased condition in the head, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy is beyond all comparison the best preparation ever invented. It is mild and pleasant to use, producing no smarting or pain, and containing no strong, irritating, or caustic drug, or other poison. This Remedy is a powerful antiseptic, and speedily destroys all bad smell which accompanies so many cases of catarrh, thus affording great comfort to those who suffer from this disease.

PERMANENT CURES. The Golden Medical Discovery is the natural "helpmate" of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It not only cleanses, purifies, regulates, and builds up the system to a healthy standard, and conquers throat, bronchial, and lung complications, when any such exist, but, from its specific effects upon the lining membrane of the nasal passages, it aids materially in restoring the diseased, thickened, or ulcerated membrane to a healthy condition, and thus eradicates the disease. When a cure is effected in this manner it is permanent.

Both Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy are sold by druggists the world over. Discovery $1.00, six bottles for $5.00. Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy 50 cents; half-dozen bottles $2.50.

A complete Treatise on Catarrh, giving valuable hints as to clothing, diet, and other matters of importance, will be mailed, post-paid to any address, on receipt of a 3-cent postage stamp.

SICK HEADACHE,

Bilious Headache, Dizziness, Constipation, Indigestion, Bilious Attacks, and all derangements of the stomach and bowels, are promptly removed and permanently cured by the use of Dr. Pierce's Pellets. In explanation of their remedial power over so great a variety of diseases, it may truthfully be said that their action upon the system is universal, not a gland or tissue escaping their sanative influence.

SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1888.

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church began the election of bishops Tuesday. Five ballots were taken, resulting in the election of Dr. J. H. Vincent and Dr. J. N. Fitzgerald. The conference extended the pastoral term to five years.

The Maryland Republican State Convention.

Following was the platform adopted by the Maryland Republican State Convention Tuesday :

The Republicans of Marvland, in convention assemb'ed, reaffirm their devotion to the principles of the National Republican party, and declare :

1. That in the free trade movement inaugurated by the Democratic party we recognize a renewed effort to aid foreign manufacturers to displace the products of American workmen with those of pauperized labor. We believe that the protective system, which has made this nation great, and its people prosperous, is the best means for maintaining that greatness and prosperity, and denounce and oppose the unpatriotic assault upon the independence and prosperity of the American workingmen.

2. That, recognizing the undesirability of a large surplus revenue, we favor the abolition of the internal taxes on tobacco and alcohol used in the arts and sciences, and the modification of the duty on sugar, and we declare that, in justice to the American interests involved, any necessary readjustment of the tariff should be made by its friends, and not by its enemies.

3. That the open and flagrant violation of the true principles of civil service reform by the present administration merits the unsparing condemnation of all patriotic citizens, and stamps the Democratic party as a self-confessed conspiracy for plunder and spoils.

4. That we commend the course of the Republican Senate in the matter of pensioning the disabled veterans of the Union armies and those dependent on them. We urge the representatives of this State in the National Convention to favor greater liberality in dealing with the just claims of these defenders of the Union.

5. That the violation of the reform pledges made by the Democratic party in this State by the majority of the Legislature recently in session, emphasizes the necessity for a change in the political administration of the State.

6. That we approve the action of the Hon. Louis E. McComas, the representative of the Sixth Congressional District of Maryland, and the other Republican members of Congress in opposing the "Mills Tariff bill," so called, and we urge them to persevere in defeating every device intended to place upon the statute book the free trade theories of Mr. Cleveland's annual message.

7. That, without expressing any preference among the eminent Republicans mentioned for the Presidency, we hereby pledge the hearty support of the Republicans of Maryland to the nominees of the next National Republican Convention.

Resolved, by the Republicans of Maryland, in Convention assembled, That we are in favor of an unqalified franchise and equality of men before the law.

The Tariff Debate Closed.

The great tariff debate on the Mills bill closed on Saturday last. Mr. Reed, of Maine, and Speaker Carlisle, of Kentucky, closing the argument. The Democratic party comes out of the struggle much the worse for the wear, while the friends of protection find themselves in a very comfortable state of mind. In speaking of the condition of the Western farmer, for whom it was claimed that the Eastern vampire had mortgaged his farm and "injured" him in other ways, Mr. Reed said :

In the fullness of time I traveled West myself. You may well imagine my astonishment, who had never seen ten acres together in corn, to behold fields of that great staple stretching away out to the horizon's edge ; to see tracts of land which seemed to have no boundaries but the visable sky ; land so rich that if we had an acre of it in Maine we would have sold it by the bushel, while on every side were the great brick houses,such a one as only the Squire lives in in our villages. After some days of this I became sulky. I said : "Gentlemen, of course we have robbed you. Your own Congressmen will not lie about trifles like that. But what disgusts me is that we do not do it more thoroughly. The gleaning looks bigger than the harvest." Then they confided to me that Western Congressmen were great orators and did this for practice. Since then I have not been so much moved by it.

Here is another unshotted gun called "the markets of the world." The markets of the world. How broad and cool these words are. They stretch from the frozen regions of the Northern pole across the blazing tropics to the ice bound shores of the Antarctic continent. All this we can have if we but give the little hand's breadth called the United States of America.

What are the markets of the world? To hear these rhetoricians declaim, you would imagine the markets of the world a vast vacum, waiting till now for American goods to break through, rush in and fill the yearning void. Will your goods go to Austria? to Italy, Germany, Russia or France Around all these benighted countries are the Chinese walls of tariff taxes. Britain herself is protected by vast capital, accumulated through ages, the spoils of her own and other lands, by a trade system as powerful as it is relentless. All these nations will contest with you the other countries which they already overflow.

Does your mouth water over the prospect ? What market do you give up for all this ? Where is the best market in the world ? Where the people have the most money to spend. Right here in the United States of America, after twenty-seven years of protectionist rule. And you are asked to give up such a market for the markets of the world. Why the history of such a transaction was told 2,400 years ago. It is a classic. You will find it in the works of Æsop, the fabulist. Once there was a dog. He was a nice little dog ; nothing was the matter with him except a few foolish free trade ideas in his head. He was trotting along, happy as the day, for he had in his mouth a nice shoulder of succulent mutton. By and by he came to a stream bridged by a plank. He trotted along and, looking over the side of the plank, he saw the markets of the world and dived for them. A minute after he was crawling up the bank the wettest, the sickest, the nastiest, the most muttonless dog that ever swam ashore.

Republican Duty.

Mr. Mill's proposition that there shall be a single test vote upon his bill, is, we are glad to see, unlikely to be adopted. Mr. McKinley and Mr. Reed, to whom the chairman of the Ways and Means made his offer, have not thought it of sufficient importance to present to their Republican colleagues. Judge Kelley even had not heard of the proposal until he read of it in the newspapers, and when he asked Mr. McKinley about the dispatch, he learned precisely what we have stated, that Mr. Mills's suggestion was not seriously considered. The Republicans in Congress will do what they can to secure a reduction of the revenues and surplus. To this end they will present a scheme of their own, which will surely decrease the income of the government and will relieve the taxpayers of a burden, but they will not rest content with that. The Mills bill is before the House for consideration and action,

The general debate upon it has been of great advantage and importance.

It has been indeed, the most interesting discussion of many years. Congress has seldom heard such admirable speeches as those which Mr. McKinley and Mr. Reed made on Friday and Saturday. Mr. McKinley's speech absolutely demolished the Mills bill in all its details, and answered conclusively the points made by Mr. Mills in his speech. The attack upon the existing tariff law was met and repulsed, and the proposed substitute was shown to be crude, illogical and inadequate to accomplish the desired reform of the tax laws. On Saturday Mr. Reed discussed the general principle underlying the two systems which are opposed to each other—Republican and Democratic,protective and free trade. Incidentally he showed that the accusations made against the present law are false, and especially the untruth of the charge that the Western farmer has been ruined by it ; but his principal contention was that pratection means prosperity and free trade means ruin.

Now that the debate is finished the work of attacking the bill by amendments will begin. Naturally the Republicans will endeavor to defeat it by offering a substitute which will show to the country precisely what they will do for the relief of its business interests, which are threatened by the accumulated surplus. If the substitute is voted dewn, the efforts of the protectionists must not end. The avalanche of amendments that the Democrats sent to the ways and means Committee, as a result of the action of the caucus, is very superficial. In the first place it has alarmed Mr. Mills and his free trade associates, and it is to avoid the necessity of acting upon them that the Ways and Means chairman has proposed that the question shall be settled by one vote on the Mills bill and one vote on whatever substitute may be prepared and offered by the Republicans. In the second place it indicates that, even if the bill should eventually pass the House, it can be shorn of some of its worst features during a consideration under the five-minute rule. The result may not be all that can be desired, but if taxes cannot be reduced in a manner that would be advantageous to the public interests, the evil that might be worked by the Mills bill should be reduced to the minimum. We have no doubt that the Senate will so amend the bill, if it should get to it from the House, that it will be a satisfactory and salutary measure, and then the question will be whether the free traders will bow to the inevitable ; whether, when they discover the impossibility of securing the adoption of their economi heresy, they will assent to the only practicable measure for the relief o the people from the admitted ardens of overtaxation. They will, of course, do precisely what the President directs, for if they adopt the Republican scheme, on finding the only remedy that can be applied to the fiscal difficulties, he will srely interpose his veto. But, whatever the free traders may do, it is he duty of the Republicans to give them an opportunity to make a law that will really reduce taxes and the revenue. The nearer that the House is brought to adopting such a measure as the Senate will send back to it, the greater the chance that the later will be agreed to.

These views of the duty of the Republicans seem so clear and unanswerable that we are not surprised that the Mills proposition has not even been presented to their colleagues by Mr. McKinley and Mr. Reed. The Republicans are not engaged in making an issue, but in trying to relieve people of unjust taxation. The Democrats have made the issue. It is not the Mills bill at all, but free trade, and it was formulated not only in the President's message, but in the history of the party before and since the war of the rebellion.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

The Real Issue.

The real issue between the protectionists and the free traders was presented yesterday by Mr. Butterworth. The manufacturers do not now ask for protection against the skill or the capital of Europe. We have the skill, Our machinery is, as a rule, better than that made abroad. Our capital is sufficient for all our industrial enterprises. The cost of production, however, is greater in this country than it is in other countries because wages are higher here. The protectionists are now engaged in an effort to uphold the tariff under which the country has become prosperous in order that wages may be maintained at their existing high rates. This is not entirely a work of philanthrophy. It is sound economy for the country to maintain high wages. A well ordered, peaceable, civilized community like that of the city of Lawrence, in Massachusetts, is of great advantage to the country. The well-paid workingmen support schools, churches, savings banks, lecture platforms and all that go to make up the civilization of which the country is justly proud. The prosperity of the wage earner increases the average prosperity of the country. It is better to have Lawrence, Lowell, Pittsburg, Philadelphia and the hundreds of similar cities which are the centres of our protected industries than smoke-grimed, drunken Manchester, the squalor and poverty of the iron and coal mines of England and Wales, and the famished potato growers of Ireland. The protectionists are fighting against free trade because they believe in keeping up the high average of American civilization, which has been attained by means of a tariff system that has enabled the manufacturers of the country to pay liberal wages to their workingmen. The damage threatened by the free traders is that the civilization of the country will deteriorate through the poverty which will surely overcome the wage earner if the principles of Mr. Cleveland and his friends triumph.—*N. OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, May 21st, 1888.—The reception given to Senator Ingalls by the Republican National League was attended by one of the most distinguished audiences ever gathered together in this city. Senator Ingalls devoted his speech mostly to an analysis of the Democratic party. Said he : "The Democratic party has fatigued public contempt and indignation. It is not a party, but an organization of vice imbecility, cowardice, and disloyalty. It is simply the compost heap of American politics, and the worn-out dogmas and cast off and abandoned articles of political clothing which have been thrown into the areas and alleys of civilization constitute to-day its chosen treasure. It has constructed its platforms out of slavery and secession, states' rights, the rag baby and free-trade, and it is not strange that a party so constituted should possess such a leader as Cleveland. No man should be blamed for getting angry on being called a Democrat. If there is anything the Democratic party is afraid of, it is the truth. No vituperation or invective is as dreadful to them as the truth, and it is not therefore surprising that they fly into spasms of indignation when the plain facts of history are read from the record, nor that their only answer is to reply in the language of the pot-house and saloon."

The Senate has passed the regular pension appropriation bill. It was slightly amended, and will have to go back to the House.

Friday and Saturday, the closing days of the general debate on the tariff, were by far the most interesting. Among the speakers on those two days were Mr. McKinley, of Ohio ; Mr. Randall, of Penn.; Mr. Reed, of Maine, and Speaker Carlisle. The galleries were crowded to suffocation, for it is not often that so many prominent members of the House can be heard in two days. The general impression is that the House will now take up some of the regular appropriation bills on the calendar and let the tariff bill rest awhile, before they begin its consideration by sections.

Mr. Mills was guilty of a discourteous act on the floor of the House on Friday last. Mr. Randall, owing to weakness from ill health, spoke very slowly and did not finish his speech in the time allotted him. Some one proposed to extend his time, but Mr. Mills jumped up and objected. He was greeted with jeers and hisses.

Mr. McKinley, who was to follow Mr. Randall stated that he would give the latter 15 minutes of his time, for which he was roundly cheered. Mr. Breckinridge, who was to follow Mr. McKinley then moved that Mr. Randall be given all the time he wanted to finish his speech and that the time be taken equally from Mr. McKinley and himself. This was agreed to.

The Republican Senators held a caucus on Friday, to talk over the outlook and agree upon a party policy in regard to several matters. A wide range of subjects was discussed but nothing was definitely settled. Another meeting will be held to-morrow.

Mr. Jehu Baker, the gigantic member from the eighteenth Illinois district, who defeated Wm. Morrison in the last Congressional election, arose in the House on Saturday to a question of personal privilege. Mr. Breckinridge, in his speech on Friday, had implied that Mr. Morrison had been defeated by the use of money and fraud. This implication Mr. Baker denied in eloquent language, and gave Mr. Breckinride some thrusts that will be fresh in his memory for some time to come. Mr. Baker's figure is a noticeable one at any time, but as he stood trembling with excitement and indignation, thundering out his denial of the charge, he was really spectacular.

The Senate finance committee have appointed a sub-committee to gather information on the tariff.

The Government printing office investigation has been resumed. One of Mr. Benedict's appointees acknowledged that he, in company with Benedict's brother, who is the chief clerk of the office, and another official had gone to Philadelphia on a two-days' pic-nic, and that the trip was paid for by a Philadelphia firm who had been given a large contract to furnish the Government printing office with paper, notwithstanding the fact that they were underbid by other parties. The fact was also brought out by a paper tester that the paper furnished by this very liberal contractor was far below the grade called for by the contract, although the receiving clerks at the Government printing office had entered it upon the books as having been tested and found up to all requirements.

On Thursday next the Senate will take up the bills for the admission of Montana, North Dakota and Washington Territories to statehood, and it is thought each of the measures will be disposed of on that day.

The New Jersey Republicans adopted an admirable platform, which, in brief, is as follows :

"We declare that at this stage of its(the Republican party's) existence, its purposes are :

"Protection to the industries of the people by a tariff adjusted to that special end.

"Protection to the civil rights of the people by securing a free ballot and an honest count to every lawful voter.

"Protection to the basis of the character of the people by general education of children.

"Protection to the government of the people by promoting the reform of the civil service.

"And protection to the homes of the people by the due restriction of vice and intemperance ; and we congraulate the Legislature of this State on their honest, earnest and courageous efforts to restrain the evils of the liquor traffic, and endorse their action.

"To these ends and for the maintenance of a truly American policy at home and abroad, we pledge to the nominees of the National convention our united and earnest support."

The Floods Abating.

QUINCY, ILL., May 21.—The great flood in the Mississippi, which will be remembered as without a precedent in the destruction and suffering created, is slowly abating, and it is thought that the worst of the high water is passed. But the worst that could happen has already occurred, hundreds of families having been rendered homeless, and thousands of acres of growing crops ruined, to say nothing of the loss entailed by demolished dwellings, wrecked fences and washouts. From the northern end of Adams county to the southern end of Pike county the land on the Illinois side of the river was protected by a system of levees, the region embracing 250,000 acres, the soil being the richest in the State. All the region is now one vast lake, from six to ten feet in depth. Along the bluffs on the eastern edge of the submerged district hundreds of families are camped, living in tents, huts and in the open air. Before the flood most of these people were well-to-do, prosperous farmers, but now they have little or nothing. Much sickness prevails among the unfortunates, owing to want and and exposure, but prompt measures have been taken to alleviate their sufferings. While the vast majority of the inhabitants fled to the higher land, a few had not time to get away or misjudged the character of the break in the levee and determined to stay at their homes and are now living in the garrets or on the roofs. Every roof has been turned into a place of refuge for live stock, poultry, &c., but numberless houses have been lifted from their foundations and carried away.

In the Sny levee district below this city the situation is infinitely worse than in the regions to the north. The crevasse which completed the inundation opened at the upper end of the embankment and the pent-up waters from the river poured over the vast tract of rich farming land, sweeping everything before it, The torrent rushed down in a great wave several feet high with a force which nothing could withstand. The towns of Fall Creek, Seehorn and Hulls are but mere islands, and hundreds of refugees are huddled together in limited space. Four or five families are living in each of the rooms in the few houses above the water, and are suffering greatly. The damage to railroad property is enormous, and it will be three weeks after the water subsides before trains can be running on time. This city is cut off from railroad communication North, West and South. The Quincy and Carthage track is under water for a distance of several miles. The Quincy Alton and St. Louis track is washed for miles, the bridges are gone and telegraph poles down, The Chicago, Burlington and Quincy and the Wabash tracks at East Hannibal were washed out Saturday morning.

Owing to the great confusion it is impossible to obtain detailed losses, but the aggregate will reach fully $3,000,000 from crops alone. The damage to the levees, houses and railroads will approximate $600,000.

The performance of Prof. J. Miller, Magician, was unusually good. He gives another entertainment to-night and will have a crowded house. His experiments are wonderful. Madam Cla Netta is excellent, and Gossner is very funny.—Harrisville Gazette.

Home Comfort Range.

The representatives of the Wrought Iron Range Co., of St. Louis, Mo., have made Oakland their headquarters, from which point they will run teams throughout this and adjoining counties of Pennsylvania and West Virginia. Their ware rooms are in the REPUBLICAN Building, where their Ranges are on exhibition. These men come here well recommended as gentlemen in every sense of the term. The following testimonial is from the Fairmont Index, of last week:

A MERITED TESTIMONIAL.

We, the undeisigned citizens of Fairmont, W. Va., take pleasure in recommending the representatives of the Wrought Iron Range Co., of St. Louis, Mo., to the favorable consideration of the good people of our neighboring towns and counties. They have made this city their headquarters for the last four months for the sale and distribution of wrought iron "Home Comfort" cooking ranges, during which time they have sold over three hundred in our immediate section of country and had dealings with the very best of our people. We find them men of integrity and ability and prompt to meet each and every engagement of the company.

A Mile a Minute.

The Baltimore and Ohio road is building a large number of new engines which, when completed, will probably be the largest and most powerful on earth. The boilers will be much larger and capable of producing three times the motive power of the largest of any of their present mountain climbers. These engines are constructed for the dual purpose of making greater speed and at the same time with reference to dispensing with the services of so many helpers on the mountains on the main stem and Pittsburgh Division. They will be used from Connelsville to Cumberland, and from Piedmont to Grafton and return. One of them will be expected to pull a passenger train of two sleepers, two coaches, a smoker, two express and one baggage car, where two large engines are now employed, and at the same time make better time than the two have yet been able to do. A. J. Cromwell, Master of Machinery of the Baltimore and Ohio, projected and is superintending the construction of the new locomotives. One of them will be put into service between Baltimore and Washington shortly and will cover the distance, 40 miles in 40 minutes. This distance is now covered in 45 minutes and three stops made en route.

Cumberland's Municipal Election.

The election for mayor, clerk and five councilmen at large for the city of Cumberland passed off quietly Monday. J. W. Shuck, Rep., was re-elected mayor over Daniel Frantz, Dem., by 126 majority. His vote was 985 to Frantz's 859. Col. Horace Resley, Dem., was re-elected clerk by 229 majority over Col. Charles Gilpin, Rep. The councilmen elected are; Wm. Pearre, Henry Shriver and J. D. Bopst, Republicans, and J. W. Humbird and W. F. Coulehan, Democrats. Four Democrats and two Republicans hold over, and the new council will stand six Democrats and five Republicans, with a Republican mayor.

The Salvation Army in Oakland.

Capts. Charles Manley and Samuel Gulley and Cadet J. W. Burton, of the Salvation Army, arrived in Oakland Tuesday, and held their first meeting on the street the same evening. These men have been operating in the mining regions, in Allegany county, for the past year and have accomplished much good. They will remain here a few weeks, and expect to be assisted by other members of the Army of both sexes in a few days.

Notice to Farmers.

Old Tax Payers.

CUMBERLAND, May 22d, 1888.

EDITOR REPUBLICAN:—You have always kept open columns for communications of a local historic character, and many thanks are due you for past favors in the way of space to the contributor in your valuable paper. We have some reason to believe that the many communications heretofore published therein from the present author have been received and read with some interest, hope also with a degree of profit.

We are persuaded to believe your readers would be glad to learn more of the old settlers and tax-payers of what is now Garrett county. Our ancestors ought always to be subjects of interest to us. It is to be lamented that our county records are insufficient to show who resided and paid taxes in the territory named prior to 1804. In that year a general assessment appears to have been made of all property in Allegany county, under a law of the same year. At any rate there is among the archieves of Allegany a ponderous book seven inches thick, weighing thirty-four pounds, showing who were then tax-payers. The county was at that time divided into 6 election districts, but these did not seem to be recognized as to assessment purposes. The county was divided into 8 assessment departments called hundreds. The territory (about) now constituting Garrett county was known as "Sandy Creek Glades' hundred," and contained, as nearly as can now be ascertained, 126 resident tax-payers, with a considerable number of non-residents, chiefly land owners. Here they are: William Ashby, John Arnold, Philip Brady, Robert Brown, Aza Beall, Robert Brandenburg, John Baker, Peter Bugh, Jacob Bugh, Thomas F. Brook, Andrew Blocher, Meshack Browning, Peter Bartroof, Andrew Buckalew, Wm. Beckwith, Elefelet Chichister, Wm. Coddington, John Coddington, Sam'l Coddington, Benjamin Coddington, Jonathan Clark, Thomas Casteel, Jeremiah Connelly, Peter Connelly, John Connelly, Wm. Crabtree, James Chiles, Joseph Davis, Peter Dale, Henry Durst, Peter Duvall, Henry Dewit, James Drane, James Erwin, Elizabeth Edwards, John Felton, John Fike, John Furguson, Mary Frazier, Joseph France, Philip Firebaugh, James Flanegan, Gabriel Friend, Joseph Friend, John Friend, Michael Fresh, Jeremiah Frazier, Jonathan Frazier, Thurman Frazier, Christian Garlitz, Charles Grimm, Nicholas Grower, Gasper Glotfeller, Daniel Grant, Geo. Gainer, John Gillman, Andrew Hendricks, John Hays, Paul Hoy, Andrew House, David Hoffman, Jr., Rudolph Hannsick, Philip Hare, Jacob Hare, Andrew Hendricks, John Irons, Thomas Jenifer, Charles James, John Jonas, Levy Knotts, Jacob Kaler, Dudley Lee, John Lynn Henry Lewis, Robert Lamar, Nicholas Musser, John Miller, Benedict Miller, Joseph Moore, Wm. B. Magruder, Frederick Marks, Thomas Marks, James McMullen, Jacob Markley, Norman B. Magruder, Isaac Morgan, Archibald Osburn, Stephen, Pearson, Samuel M. Pearson, Nicholas Paugh, Michael Paugh, Thomas Paugh, Thomas Pricherd, Jr., William Pricherd, John Park, Roger Poland, George Rinehart, John Rush, John Ruttan, Joseph Riley, Selvester Ryland, John Stuck, John Swann, George Stanton, Robinson Savage, Abraham Shockey, Nicholas Storm, David Stotts, Jesse Stotts, John Simkins, John Spurgen, John Storm, Thos. Stewart, Alex Smith, Robert Sinkler, John Templeman, Wm. Thistle, David Tichenal, Jesse Tomlinson, Isaac Umble, David Vansickle, John Votts, John Wable, Thomas Wilson, Joseph White, Wm. White, John Wiland and Adam Yeast.

Fifteen of these ancestors were owners of slaves amounting to 62 in all. The greatest owner of this since condemned property was Alex. Smith—11. Pretty strong for the climate, but the number increased considerably within the 25 years after the date named. Strange to say, there is now scarcely a dozen colored people in the county. They have diminished in about the same ratio the whites have increased. A noteworthy fact is that so few of these ancients are now represented in the county in name by their descendants. The most prominent in them days seem now to be most obscured.

Body Disinterred.

The body of Beswick, killed on the W. Va. C. R. R. near Elkins, Md., week before last, was disinterred Monday, by direction of W. P. Townshend, State's Attorney for Garrett county, and a thorough examination of the remains was made by Drs. J. Lee and H. W. McComas, who could not find the slightest evidence of foul play. This action was deemed necessary by the State's Attorney on account of rumors of foul play rife in the neighborhood.

Swanton.

Lewis Paugh, 61 years of age, met a sad death on Saturday evening last. Mr. Paugh's home was near Mt. Zion Church, and on Saturday evening his son left him to put away his team, leaving his father alone. He was gone but a short time when on returning to the house he found his unfortunate father burnt in a terrible manner, his clothing all consumed, while the flesh was burned until it fell from the bone. Mr. Paugh lived but a short time after the sad occurrence, and, as far as we could learn, made no statement in regard to how the matter occurred. He leaves a family of grown children.

Truman Mosser had a valuable cow killed just west of Swanton on last Sunday morning by train No. 3.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Fairall are preparing to keep summer boarders. They have just built a new porch and made some other improvements to their house. They understand the art of making a person comfortable, and we think they will have a full house. We hope it will prove a successful venture. Of one thing we are sure, that any one desiring a nice, comfortable home, away from the noise, heat and din of the city, might do a great deal worse than spend their summer at Swanton.

Rev. I. A. Kiracofe preached in the U. B. Church on Sunday, 20th inst., to an attentive congregation.

The U. B. Sunday School still continues to grow in interest and the membership is increasing. A friend of the school has lately presented it with two large maps of Palestine. Another friend is now making us a present of a library which we expect to have for next Sunday. All are cordially invited to attend.

Miss Lizzie Kahl and Miss Hinebaugh, of Accident, are visiting friends at this place.

Mrs. Mahala friend, wife of A. G. Friend, died at this place Tuesday. She was a consistent member of the U. B. Church, and although she had consumption and was sick for a long time suffering greatly, yet she was resigned to God's will and died in the triumphs of faith. She leaves behind her a large family of children. The family have the sympathy of the community.

HOOSIER.

Mountain Lake Park.

Dr. C. P. Masden, of N. Y. City, arrived here with his family last Saturday night. He is painting his house on the outside, and is doing the painting and papering on the inside.

Mrs. Camphfor, of Oakland, has moved into the Sharpes cottage.

Mrs. H. P. Tasker has rented the Alexander cottage, and moved into it last Saturday.

As a rule empires move westward, but now the improvements here are extending northward. Lots are being sold along the new drives, and work is being done with a view to build at once.

The cleaning up of grounds, grading streets and cleaning up generally is still going on.

State of Trade.

In spite of the abounding and unconquerable vitality of the country, periods of temporary hesitation, or reaction, are inevitable, and one has apparently been reached. The country at present is borrowing more and producing less. The local market for securities depends essentially upon the placing of bonds abroad and the foreign demand for stocks, and both continue. But for the movement of foreign capital this way, to pay for bonds and stocks, a heavy outgo of gold would be required to meet the excess of imports over exports. Success in borrowing foreign money to pay for imports makes the markets for securities strong, and money here is superabundant. But, meanwhile, reactions at an increasing number of points in the interior are slow; caution of buyers checks production in important industries, and crop prospects are not flattering. For the time, the tendency is toward a decrease in production.

ST. LOUIS, 1887.

I desire to express to you my hearty thanks for putting up the "Home Comfort" Range in my house. You could not take it away—if I could not get another of the same pattern—if you would pay me double the price you ask for it. It fills the bill exactly. The women folks are charmed with it. It bakes admirably, and is just the thing we were so badly in need of. No woman can be happy if deprived of the "Home Comfort" after having once used it. In designing the "Home Comfort" Range, you have conferred a great blessing upon the "women folks," and have done much to make home folks happy.

Yours truly,
NORMAN J. COLMAN,
Now U. S. Commissioner of Agriculture.

GENTLEMEN.—The "Home Comfort" Range now in use in our home is superior to any we have ever used. I most respectfully tender this evidence of its merits.

Very respectfully,
MRS. W. T. SHERMAN.

We sell more ranges in the city of St. Louis than ALL OTHERS COMBINED. This is extremely satisfactory to us, and should be a guarantee to strangers, that in buying a "HOME COMFORT" Range they run no risk. The FINEST GRADE OF MALLEABLE IRON, in connection with the best soft steel plates, handled and put together by the best steel and iron workers money can control, is the reason our Ranges are uniformly successful, besides our experience of over twenty years has been utilized to bring to its present state of perfection the

"HOME COMFORT" RANGE.

Mr. Jos. Powell, of Sulphur P. O., Trimble county, Ky., writes: "We have been keeping house twenty years, and have used up four cast iron stoves. We have now a 'Home Comfort' Range, and my wife pronounces it the most perfect, economical and in every way most satisfactory cooking apparatus she has ever had occasion to use."

OAKLAND, GARRETT CO., MD.

ONLY ONE CROP.

There came a man in days of old,
To hire a piece of land for gold,
And urged his suit in accents meek,
One crop alone is all I seek.
That harvest o'er, my claim I yield,
And to its Lord resign the field.

The owner some misgivings felt,
And coldly with the stranger dealt,
But found his last objection fail,
And honeyed eloquence prevail;
So took the proffered price in hand,
And for one crop leased out the land.

The wily tenant sneered with pride,
And sowed the spot with acorns wide;
At first like tiny shoots they grew,
Then tall and wide their branches threw.
But long before those oaks, sublime,
Aspiring, reached their forest prime
The cheated landlord mouldering lay,
Forgotten, with his kindred clay.

O, ye whose years, unfolding fair,
Are fresh with youth, and free from care,
Should vice or indolence desire
The garden of your souls to hire,
No parley hold: reject the suit,
Nor let one seed the soil pollute.

My child, their first approach beware;
With firmness break the insidious snare,
Lest, as the acorns grew and throve
Into a sun-excluding grove,
Thy sins, a tall, o'ershadowing tree,
Shut out the light of Heaven from thee.

WHAT ROB DID.

And All Because of His Attentive Hearing.

Little Rob was "a queer child." There could be no doubt about it. Every one said said so; even his mother, who always added "but he is a dear little boy." What could be the matter with him! he wondered, as he peeped into the looking-glass to find out. All he saw there was a round face, big brown eyes, a large nose which his brother called a pug, and plenty of dark brown curly hair. Nothing different from many of his playfellows, saving perhaps his freckles, which were plenty, Rob soberly admitted.

When his father said to his mother: "Hush, here's our little pitcher, he has big ears, you know," Rob thought to himself: "It must be my ears. I'll go and look." So he gazed at them, turning this way and that, and finally measured them with his mother's tape measure, "to know for sure," he said to him-self. That night he set up in bed when his mother came to tuck him up.

"Mamma," said Rob, "I measured lots of the fellows' ears after school; Willie Stratton's, Fred Warren's, Ed Pierson's and lots of others, and they're all as big as mine and bigger except John Willis'. His are awful small and he's real stingy. Now why did papa call mine pitchers? I asked the teacher but she laughed and said she couldn't tell me."

His mother had hard work to keep from laughing at the characteristic question, but the earnest face restrained her; and, covering Rob with warm blankets, she explained the meaning of the proverb and added: "My little boy must use what he hears to help others, and never repeat any thing except to papa or me. To hear quickly and correctly will be a great help when you are a man, but now you must go to sleep and be ready for play in the morning."

Rob had partly guessed it this time. It was his ears which made him queer. There never were sharper ones to hear all the speeches older people made—careless, wise, thoughtful and joking—all were caught by his sharp ears and laid away in the active mind to be brought out at some unexpected moment. Such an alive little fellow as he was! From the time he could talk his lively tongue was the terror of his older sister and brother, whose dearest secrets he often made known to the cold world. At length his father said his little boy must stop talking if he could not help hearing, and a banishment from the family sitting-room followed. This, together with some loving, reproving talks from his mother, taught Rob to be silent.

But every one loved Rob. Even Dash, the dog, who was getting old and cross, would wag his tail when Rob came by. Such willing feet and hands he had, and such a generous, tender heart.

But I must tell you what Rob did and how he put one piece of knowledge to its best use. Mr. Gray, Rob's father, lived on the main street at the end of of a country village. Near the house stretched a large meadow crossed by a brisk little river with shelving, sandy banks. One summer, Rob's two little cousins, Bessie and Amy, were brought there while their frail mother was taken to the mountains. Rob was delighted at the prospect of constant playfellows. Although he could whistle and halloo as loud as any boy, climb and jump, tear off his buttons, burst his shoes and dismay his mother with break-neck pranks, yet he was full of kindness and chivalric instincts towards those younger and weaker than himself. Bessie was about eight and almost as tall as Rob, while Amy was a tiny blue-eyed child a couple of years younger. Both were city-bred and shy, timorous creatures, given to quiet plays. Rob was greatly attracted by their gentle ways and their brave efforts to smile when their father and mother went away, leaving them alone for the first time in their lives. Rob's bright eyes saw just how it was, and then he heard his uncle say to his mother: "Don't let any harm happen to our little girls, for the doctor said a sudden shock would kill Alice." From that moment he gave himself up to caring for his cousins all the long summer. Sister Grace dressed them and curled their hair each day and prepared a pleasant room next to hers for them, while Rob's mother fed them generous bowls of bread and milk, cookies, gingerbread and berries, and coaxed them with toothsome broths and eggs. She privately said to Rob's father that it was pitiful to see how much of them was merely clothes and how little was body.

But it was Rob who took chre of them all the day, taking them to the barn to hunt for eggs or watched the cows milked; giving the part of his garden patch and helping them weed and water the mignonette, petunias and straggling sweet peas they planted: teaching them to ride his velocipede, and even initiating them into the mysteries of playing marbles and ball. He swung them till his manly arms ached. He took them fishing with him, although their chatter drove the perch away and he was obliged to come away with only three on his twig. Rob was a natural fisherman and this was indeed a trial, for his efforts were never before so poorly rewarded. Every game he knew he taught Bessie and Amy, and showed them every favorite hiding place. They in their turn thought him the "loveliest boy in the world," and each little scrawl of a letter to their mother was chiefly made up of "Rob did this," or "Rob showed us how," or "Rob let us take that."

The days passed by swiftly and happily for these young people and August was drawing towards its end. The days were oppressively hot, and the children, tired of books and quiet games, one day went down the country road, shaded by maples and elms set set out by Rob's grandfather. "O," said Rob, "let's go and sit under that big maple by the river! I can see the leaves move, and I guess there'll be a breath of air there and lots of stones and sticks to peg into the water."

Rob led the way, crawling through a convenient hole in the rail fence. Skip went the stones and splash went the water, struck now and then by bits of tree branches. Laughing and shouting as each threw, absorbed in skipping stones, they did not heed the danger coming near.

A loud, snarling bark was suddenly heard and, looking up, Rob saw a large black dog with foaming mouth, leaping the fence and coming towards them. In an instant he seized Bessie's and Amy's hands, and fairly dragging them down to the river, stepped resolutely into the water. The little girls lost their trust in "what Rob did" and began to scream and plunge back at the touch of the cold water. Rob took them by the arms almost roughly and pulled them in by main force. It was a severe strain for him, and his face whitened and every muscle in legs and arms was rigid with the effort. But he never let go his hold, dragging with all his might until he reached the middle of the river. The girls were now sobbing with fright and clinging to him in turn, afraid to stir, afraid even to look at the water. All the while the dog was running up and down the bank, snarling and howling fiercely at them, while the foam dropped from his mouth in horrid white patches. The current was quite swift but Rob knew his ground. Just along under the tree was a sand bar which ran out well into the stream, on which his brother had taught him to swim and where he had often been. It would have been easy to stand there alone, but with two crying, frightened children it was quite another matter to keep his footing in the current, although the water was scarcely up to his waist.

"O Bessie," he cried "do try to stand still and not push against me so, for I must keep hold of Amy, too. You know she's the littl'st and you'll help me, won't you?" he added in coaxing tones as Bessie stopped her crying for a moment. But a glance at the dog made her tears break forth afresh. "O Rob, I am so afraid of the dog! O, he'll bite us; he will, he will! See him jump! What shall we do! Rob, dear Rob, do take us home! O, papa, papa! and Bessie clutched Rob with both hands, trembling all over.

"O, I am so cold!" sobbed Amy. "I want to go home! The dog! the dog! don't let him bite me! Oh! Oh! she shrieked, pitifully.

"There, there," said Rob, "Don't be afraid; I'll take care of you. The dog's mad; I've heard lots about them, you see, and they won't touch water. It's like poison to them. We must just stay here where he won't touch us, and by and by he will get sick of waiting for a bite of us and go off."

"Would no one ever see them? How long must we stand here? I can't do it much longer," he thought as he tried to brace himself afresh and tighten his hold on each child. But just then when his strength was ebbing, the parting mesage of his uncle and a new idea gave him fresh courage. "I'll tell you. Let's all scream together and let the dog see we can beat him in noise."

Little Amy stopped her sobbing and wriggling and began with a will. "Hurrah!" screamed Rob, stoutly followed by a second shrill "Hurrah!" from Amy, whose naturally buoyant spirits rose at an invitation to make a noise, and a desolate "Papa! Papa!" from Bessie.

Just then a rickety buggy drawn by an old white horse came jogging down the road from the village. A lank, bent man in his shirt sleeves and straw hat was driving. At the bridge his ears caught the children's voices and his quick, keen eyes took in the situation. "Great Scott!" he exclaimed. Calling the old horse to a sudden halt, he jumped from the buggy, bringing with him a gun, which he loaded quickly. The furious brute soon saw the man and bounded at him with red, angry eyes. A quick pointing of the gun, a sharp crack, and with a yell the dog rolled over on his side and never moved again He had been hit between the eyes.

"Come on, youngsters, I guess he won't do much biting now!" said the man, as he ran up to the children.

"Who be you, anyway?" he asked, as Rob helped the little girls up the bank.

But Rob was suddenly speechless and fell to the ground. The man carried him to his buggy; the girls followed after. Learning from them where they lived, old Whitey was soon jogging at a faster pace into the village again, and Rob was in his mother's arms.

Then he smiled and said: "Mamma, it was pretty hard work but I did hold on to them."

Sister Grace and Bridget put the girls into dry clothes and mamma made them drink some pepermint tea, "so as not to get a cold," she said and they were soon as merry as ever. Poor Rob felt a little weak and was glad to lie on the lounge and let his mother pet and care for him.

"Rob kept hold of us just as tight and told us not to be afraid!" exclaimed Bessie.

"And I'm going to write papa just how good you take care of us," added Amy.

"Well, Rob, my boy, can't you find your tongue and tell us how you happened to think to go into the water?" said Mr. Gray, who had joied the group.

"You see, papa," answered Rob, "I was over to Fred Warren's the other night to see his new rabbits, and then we sat on the steps and talked about our new postage stamps. He'd got some foreign ones. Mr. Wrren was reading the paper out loud to Fred's mother, all about a girl's being bit by a mad dog, and I heard him say that a mad dog wouldn't touch water. And when I saw the dog so near us and we couldn't get home, I thought of that. I knew about the sand bar you know, and so I went right in."

No one could help smiling over Rob's characteristic explanation, though all hearts were full of thankfuness for his quick-witted and courageous behavior. His uncle and aunt, who came back for their children in due time, made quite a hero of him. But Rob cared most for a new velocipede with "a regular bicycle seat on springs, boys," on which he raced all the fal and forgot all about mad dogs in his delight over the wonderful "time" he could make.

THE DOMESTIC TYRANT.

A Wretch Who Glories in Wounding the Feelings of Others.

No person more completely possesses the power of creating misery in his house than the domestic tyrant embittering, as he does, the lives of his nearest relatives by his selfishness and exigeant temper. The great essentials for happiness in social life are freedom and trust; but these important elements are banished out of the little home-world ruled over by one of these imperious autocrats. He makes it a rule to exhibit the most profound disregard for the feelings of others, and by an indulgence in covert sneers, harsh and insulting words, the self-control of his victims is sorely tried. Consciousness of power is no doubt the cause of his overbearing ways. The domestic tyrant always has the highest possible appreciation of himself. His opinion admits of no question. Being his opinion, it must be right, and in an arbitrary manner he expects his family to acquiesce, or to feign acquiescence, with him on all points. He looks upon himself in every sense as a superior being, far above his surroundings. In his own estimation he is too highly bred and too refined to support the inconveniences of daily occurrences which are endured by others. His organization is too sensitive and finely strung to tolerate small domestic troubles. He, if any thing, is only too generous and virtuous; he feels compassion for himself alone, regretting that the grandeur of his character is not sufficiently appreciated. His most trifling acts are magnified by him into samples of stupendous liberality. In his complete self satisfaction he announces he is only too good in sacrificing himself, and he laments that he does not receive the admiration he considers his due.

He possesses in the highest degree the power of wounding the feelings of others, and by his persistent efforts to mortify their sensibilities, he appears to treat that power as an accomplishment, which he never neglects to display at every opportunity. The inmates of many an apparently happy home, if questioned as to the background, would bear testimony as to wrung hearts, caused by a domestic tyrant. No wonder, with such a man for the head of the house, there is a general sense of relief when the front door shuts behind him, and a feeling of suppressed joy when he is away. Besides the misery caused by him to his household, the domestic tyrant must really experience a considerable amount of mental discomfort himself. He can not fail to perceive the sort of change that comes over the cheerful family party when he appears or the kind of chill that his presence brings. Instinct must tell him how carefully topics of conversation are chosen for the family meals, how much constraint prevails, and what a strict avoidance of any subject there is that may lead to wrathful questionings. Curiously enough, out of his home he is generally the genial, jovial sort of man, and very likely is looked upon as a rather good-hearted sort of fellow, for it is only to his family that he shows his teeth.—Christian at Work.

VALUE OF SLEEP.

Hints to Young Men on a Vital Subject from Dr. Collyer.

Nothing is more disregarded by many young men of to-day than the necessity of seasonable sleep; yet nothing is more essential to good health and long life. Robert Collyer, in his "Talks to Young Men," devotes an exceedingly interesting chapter to the subject, and the following are his closing remarks:

Now, let me draw a few simple lessons from this truth I have tried to open. You, young men, must remember that one grand factor in your well being and well doing will lie in a good sound sleep. You may think it does not matter; take my word for it—the word of a man who has had to walk through rugged ways to his three-score years and three—that it does matter a great deal.

Your sleep is the hidden treasure of your youth to-day, and to-morrow it will be the margin you will have to draw on for your age. Do you think you can racket round into the small hours, snatch a brief repose, and then be just as good as ever to hold and bind? it is not true. Many a young man sells his birthright in this way, and can not have it back again, though he seek it with many tears. Take your honest eight hours sleep, if you may; there is life in it and grace. It is one of the good angels which will save you from the temptation to drink, give you an even mind, brighten all your powers, and do many things for you no other power can do.

So when you get farther on, and are in the thick of the world's business, do not forget what virtue lies in this good habit. You may make more money by sitting up nights, but the chances are you will not keep it; carve out a good business, and then have to quit; or grow eminent in your profession, and then break down. Good fortune turns greatly on good habits, and this is one of the best. We can go just so far and then we have to fall back on Nature and on God for new power. But if we say, "I will work double tides," and so get fevered and out of tune with the true laws of success in life, then the day comes when our power turns to something like paralysis. Your true business or professional man is the man who rises well rested, with a cool, clear brain and steady nerve—the man who can shake off business after business hours, go to sleep like a yearling child, and rise like the sun, rejoicing as a strong man to run a race. * * * And it is a great mistake in good men to say this is a shameful waste of time, when it may be and so often is, the best possible use of time; or that we should be at our work or our prayers, while still we need this on which the worth of the work or the prayer is to turn.

I say, that to sleep one hour more in such a case is better than either to labor or pray, and may bring us nearer both to God and man.—N. Y. Voice.

DEHORNING CATTLE.

The Arguments Advanced in Its Favor by Stock Raisers.

The practice of dehorning cattle is rapidly increasing not only in the West, but in some sections of the Eastern and Middle States. The chief objection urged against dehorning has been the cruelty of the operation; a lesser one is that it detracts from the appearance of the animal. The second objection remains, but the great majority of those who have practiced dehorning contend that it is no more painful, if as painful, as other operations generally practiced. However this may be, it is fairly safe to conclude that dehorning, carefully performed, is not a dangerous operation. The arguments advanced in favor of dehorning cattle are: First, the prevention of terrible accidents in handling vicious cattle, especially bulls; second, that the dehorned cattle can be turned loose in sheds and stalls without fear of their injuring each other, even if they are more or less crowded. The subject has received considerable attention this season at the farmers' institutes and clubs, and if reports of these meetings may be relied upon the farmers and breeders who have experimented in dehorning their cattle almost with one accord favor the practice. From these and other sources it appears that the preferred age at which to dehorn is in the second year of the animal's life, and spring is the season favored. The operation, it is averred, is more successful in moderate weather, than in either extremes of heat or cold. Preparatory to the operation the animal's head is made fast; then the horns are sawed off with a suitable saw close to the hair, where a soft place occurs in the horns.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

—A cheese-cloth comfortable may be made nearly as light as one of elder down by unrolling the cotton-batting and hanging it on a clothes-horse in front of the fire. Let it get just as hot as possible, taking care that it does not burn. The heat separates the minute fibers, causing the cotton to expand to nearly twice its original bulk. Cut the cheese cloth in lengths of about two and one half yards each, two widths being enough for each side. Put the layer of cotton lengthwise, the next crosswise and so on until all is used.

TEMPERANCE READING.

DAISY'S LETTER.

What She Wrote to the Cowboy on the Ranch.

"Would you, granny?"

"I think I would, Daisy."

"Then I will," and Daisy Brown began to write as Granny Brown advised. The writer soon brought her pen to a halt.

"Where is David?" she asked.

"Out in Montana. I'll tell you where, and it is a hard life for him."

"He has been gone how long?"

"Oh, your brother David has been off now four years."

"Well, I will put it into my letter, though I don't know how to begin."

"Say this, what I tell you."

"I will."

"Write: 'Our folks are very much interested'—"

"Wait till I get it down."

There was a space of silence.

"All ready, granny."

"'Interested in Temperance, and how is it on the ranch?'"

More silence.

"'I know you will stick'—got that?"

"Most."

"'Stick to your pledge, won't you?' There, that will do. Now, when you have got through your letter, I will put in a word."

Something else she put into the letter. Granny not only added a word, but in her thoughts she breathed a prayer. The letter went to Montana.

"Hello! What's up?" said Long-legged Dave, for they did not call him Mr. David Brown out there. He was on horseback, halting before a little camp-fire, where he had prepared his lonely dinner.

"What's up?" asked Long-legged Dave again.

Looking along the level of the great plain that came like a sea out of the mysterious east and rolled away to the west till the Rocky Mountains stopped it, Long-legged Dave saw a man on horseback.

"Riding on horseback!" he muttered.

It was a pleasant sight to see that horeman on the wide, solitary plain.

"It's one of our boys," said Long-legged Dave. "Makes things seem more homelike."

Nearer, nearer came the horseman, and at last Long-legged Dave saluted him as "Smiling Jimmy, how are you?"

"The same to you. Just from the ranch, and brought you a letter."

A letter! What was it? Who wrote it?

"Ho, ho!" said the owner of the long legs. "It's Daisy! Bless the child!"

He read all that letter contained, smiled when he read the Temperance section, and then thrust it into a pocket in the breast of his red shirt. It was a deep pocket. It made one think that what went down so far would have a hard time getting up. The letter did get up, though. Again and again it was read by little camp-fires when the sun was gone down, and sometimes as the sun was coming up, and then when that furnace of gold was burning overhead at noon. And every time he read the Temperance section he smiled, and every time he smiled he also said:

"Oh, sis is a little girl; she don't know about these things. And granny, she is getting old."

If he only could have heard Daisy pray about somebody away out on the far plains, and granny pray, too, about "our folks out on the ranches," he would not have belittled them as little sis and old granny.

"Say, Long-legged Dave, let's go in town, some day," remarked Smiling Jimmy, one night, when lying on their backs near their camp-fire and watching the bright twinkling stars.

"I am the man for ye the next time we have a chance," replied his companion.

The chance came finally. Dave took his long legs and Jimmy his smile into a so-called "cow-town," a busy, bustling frontier settlement, where a big meeting of the ranchmen was coming off. Jimmy was a sunny, laughing companion, as his nickname implied.

"Well," said Dave, as he and his friend Jimmy rode into town in cowboy style, wearing their broad-brimmed hats, flannel shirts and leather overalls, a revolver tucked away in the belt. "We had better stop at that saloon yonder."

He had forgotten about a letter written by one Daisy. However, granny had prayed for "our folks out on the ranches" that very morning.

"Well-e-e!" said Smiling Jimmy. He, too, had forgotten something, a certain promise made to those at home to let drink alone.

It was a rough and dirty saloon, and vile like all saloons, even when they are neat and elegant. It was crowded with cowboys and miners. Dave stepped up to the box, but thought he would just make sure that he had his money to pay for the drinks. His hand dove deep into that breast-pocket.

"What's this?" he said. "Money wrapped up in this piece of paper? Didn't know I stuck it there."

He pulled it out, opened it and could not help reading this: "I know you will stick to your pledge, won't you?" As if it had been a red-hot brand marked with those letters, somehow that line was stamped, burnt into his soul. Dave hesitated.

"Well!" said the bar-tender. "What will you have?"

Dave staggered.

"Come, speak!" cried the devil's peddler.

Dave conquered. "I—I won't take any thing. I'll keep my word," he said, and moved away.

"You're a funny man!" shouted the bar-tender.

"May be, but I knew what I am up to," shouted Dave, in return, "and I shouldn't if I staid here."

"Where going?" cried Jimmy.

"Come!" said Dave, who knew that the smiling one would do as his stronger will decided.

"I am glad," declared Jimmy, when they got outside, "I am glad you did not stop. But what made you leave?"

"Ah, Jimmy, it was a little gal at home. When I put my hand in my pocket I fetched up her letter, you see."

It was only an hour later when a cowboy that they knew and had met in the saloon rode up to them and said: "I saw you two go out, and I followed. Lucky! Had some awful hard shooting there 'fore they got through fifteen minutes, they tell me. Who was it that did not want to stay?"

"Set it down to Long-legged Dave," answered Smiling Jimmy.

"No, set it down to my little sis," added Dave.

Yes, and to the old lady who never forgot to pray, each day, "for our folks out on the ranches."—Rev. Edward A. Rand, in Interior.

TEMPERANCE ITEMS.

FROM day to day the criminal courts more thoroughly establish the intimacy between liquor and lunacy.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

THE insurance companies of Great Britain declare that total abstainers fall short 30 per cent. of the ordinary expectancy of death, while the 99 per cent. of moderate drinkers have attained the expectancy.

DIOGENES was a good Temperance man. When blamed for throwing a goblet of wine on the ground, and wasting so much liquor, he answered: "Had I drank it there would have been a double waste. I, as well as the wine, would have been lost."

REV. DR. CUYLER is authority for the statement that "this Nation is spending more money for intoxicating drinks than for all the bread it eats and all the clothes it wears, all the books it reads and all the churches it has ever built."

AT Altoona, Pa., recently a young woman addicted to drink fell dead in her bridal costume a short time before she was to have been married; and at San Francisco a boy of seven, who, with a playmate, had drank the contents of a quart bottle of whisky which he found in the house, was poisoned and killed by the liquor.

THE "treating" habit causes three-fourths of the drunkenness in this country, and it would not exist were it not for the saloons. They are hotbeds of vice, promoters of crime; they break up thousands of homes each year, and drag thousands of men and women to the depths of poverty, degradation and disease.—Philadelphia News.

UNITED STATES Senator Johnathan Chace, of Rhode Island, says: It is my wish also "to stand up and be counted" with those who wish to rid our land of the saloon incumbus. The saloon is the enemy of morality, religion and prosperity, the ally of every form of crime and wickedness, and a menace to the liberties of the people.

A CURIOUS feature of the new liquor law in Atlanta is the black list. When a man appears before the city recorder on a charge of drunkenness for the second time, and is convicted, he is black-listed, and his name is furnished to all liquor dealers, who, under a penalty of $500 fine, are forbidden to sell him liquor under one year.

A NEW YORK laboring man was so exasperated at the brewers for locking out their men that he determined to boycott beer of all kinds, and he found that he had so much more money Saturday night than ever before that he has declared the boycott perpetual. Many laboring men would do well to follow his excellent example.—Texas Siftings.

THE Sunday-closing law in New Jersey went into effect Sunday, and worked a revolution, the State enjoying her Sabbath as she had never done before. Every saloon in Jersey City was closed, one of them displaying the sign on the door: "Closed for the first time in seventy years." The dispatches say that the city presented the novel aspect of a day with no drunken, noisy crowds in its streets. Even Hoboken enjoyed such a quiet Sabbath as she has never known before.—Union Signal.

A Woman's Appeal.

The following extract from a letter which a "poor drunkard's wife" sends to the New York Evening Sun, is sad as it is suggestive. She says: "I can not see why men with good sense and judgment will approve of a man selling intoxicating drinks, for it takes the senses and feeling out of a man and leaves him powerless to the mercy of the police. I have seen policemen on Sunday standing at a liquor store and letting men, women and children go in and out with pitchers of beer and never say a word to them. I think the Sunday law ought to be enforced, so that the drunkard's wife and children may have something to eat on a Monday morning. Look at the handsome liquor stores, with their costly window panes and mirrors and every inducement to take men from their homes, which are decorated only with poverty. I hope that those men who are in favor of liquor traffic will hearken to the voices of thousands more of poor heart-broken drunkards' wives and children."

MEMORY'S FLOWERS.

[Written for This Paper.]

LIKE the custom beautiful of ours
That sets aside a special holy day,
When we may strew, with memory's glowing flowers,
The graves of Blue and Gray.

Not only those whose lives are fair and brief,
For only flowers of the earth are they—
Flowers of the heart, that breathe of hope and grief,
That will not fade away.

But let us not our offerings confine
To patriots who fell on battle heights;
Let all our loved who died to life divine
Share in the sacred rites.

Where is the home whose circle is complete?
Where is the heart that has not lost a friend?
Go, cast your flowers where their incense sweet
May, with your prayers, ascend!

Ah! flowers can speak when our poor lips are dumb,
Of love or woe, in language of their own;
And, clustered on the grave, bring utterance from
The cold lips of the stone.

GEORGE BIRDSEYE

ONE MEMORIAL DAY.

The Story of a Family Feud and Its Ending.

"WHERE did you get them, daughter?" The faded eyes of the mother looked inquiringly into the bright, winsome face of her seventeen-year-old daughter, as her wasted hands caressed the oranges and luscious fruits which lay at her side in a basket.

"Well, figuratively speaking, mamma, I met an orange tree down town," replied the young girl, with a delightful little laugh, "and a very little shake sufficed to dislodge a few, than a grape-vine careered across my path and offered its fruits; next a plum-tree shook itself in my apron, and here you are, little mother, and I want to see you enjoy one of these oranges straightway," and bringing a plate and fruit-knife, she began paring one of the juicy globes for the invalid.

The mother smiled. "My Grace has been denying herself, I know," she said, fondly, the hectic flush on her cheek growing deeper in the excitement of the little surprise, "though how, I can not imagine, for it seems as if we had economized to the last possible degree already. You surely have not appealed to your grandfather again?" and the pinched face took on a look of alarmed pride.

"No, no, mother, you need not fear," replied Grace, her bright face clouded for a moment by the thought. "Let him keep his riches and his wrath together; but lest you fret over the mystery, mamma, I will tell you. I have stopped the music lessons. That is all."

"Oh, Gracie, and you need them so much in preparing for the future."

"But Prof. Enderby has offered me the use of his piano, and I am to practice every day and take a thorough review of all that I have gone over," said the girl, speaking rapidly. She would not for the world have allowed the mother to know what a trial it had been to open her heart to the stately professor, telling him her sore need, in addition to the pain of giving up her beloved music. He had responded nobly, offering her free tuition and the use of his piano until such time as she could begin earning for herself; but her Southern pride would not allow her to accept any thing but his sympathy and the use of the instrument.

The mother sighed. "But you were progressing so rapidly, dear, and when I am gone—"

The daughter placed her white hand over the mother's lips, while the brown eyes filled with tears; she could not bear to hear the unwelcome truth alluded to.

"Don't, mamma," she pleaded, "I can not bear the thought, and if it must come, Holly, Freda and I will live on potatoes and salt rather than see you suffer for lack of these little dainties which it is such a pleasure to procure for you," and she kissed the parched lips tenderly.

Just then the door opened and there was a sound of excited voices. "Oh, mamma, we are on the Decoration programme and are to march in the procession," and Holly's boyish face was bright with pleasure.

His name was Holroyd, an odd old family name, which had been handed down from father to son for many years and abbreviated to Holly in the nursery. His frank, honest face bore a wonderful resemblance to a pictured face which hung in its frame over the invalid's couch, and her eyes lighted up with pleasure as she looked in the blue eyes, so like his father's, with motherly pride.

"And I am one of the band to scatter flowers on the grave," said Freda, eagerly, "and I am to wear white, with a sash."

The mother sighed. "Is it so near Decoration Day again?" she said. "How the years fly away," and she cast a quick glance at the picture above her. "Ten years since your papa died, and yet it seems in one sense so long, so long;" then a dreamy, satisfied expression stole over her face, at the thought how short the time would now be before she would be reunited to the husband of her youth.

Grace read the look aright and shuddered as she thought of the trial in store for her, but the little ones, with the happy unconsciousness of youth, chattered on gaily of the coming Decoration Day.

They were twins, now nearly twelve years old, and in their dispositions the good and gentle traits of both parents were happily blended, and there was not a sunnier, happier pair of children in the town than Holly and Freda Graham. The little family had a history. Twenty-five years before the father, Holroyd Graham, had been the petted son of a wealthy father in a Northern State; sisters there were also, but the son was the idol of the father's heart. He was a most indulgent parent when his prejudices were not disturbed, but he was man of violent and unreasonable prejudices, and when the war broke out, his wrath against the Southern people was so vindictive and harsh that he could see no good in them collectively or individually, and he was eagerly ready to give up his only and well-beloved son to go and fight the hated rebels, since he himself was physically incapacitated from doing so at the time, and the son went out from his native town at the head of his company, followed by the benediction of his father, and with the echo of his parting words in his ear: "Lick 'em, boy. Thrash 'em out of their boots for me, since I can not go myself." A much more characteristic leave-taking than a more sentimental one would have been.

The young man rode away with a share of his father's vindictive spirit infused into his own gentler nature, but as the war progressed he saw so many touches of a kindred nature among the people he had come to conquer that he came to pity as well as blame, and culminated his soft-heartedness by falling desperately in love with the fair and gentle girl who afterward became his wife and the mother of his children.

He had found her in an old mansion which the Union forces had taken possession of, caring for an invalid mother, and cowering and trembling with fear, with no one beside to protect her but an old negro mammy and her decrepit husband, and his chivalric heart went out to her at once as he reassured and calmed her fears, and made the invasion as pleasant as possible under the circumstances. The troops were quartered in the vicinity for a fortnight, and, when they were ordered on, Holroyd Graham carried the heart of the fair Southern girl away with him and left his own in her keeping.

The father's wrath may be imagined when, upon his son's return from the war, scarred from honorable service, he learned that he was determined to make the penniless Southern girl his wife; but the son had his share of his father's firmness, and, after a fierce quarrel, they parted, the son leaving wealth and home for the sake of her whom he loved.

The breach had never been healed, and Holroyd Graham, after ten years of happy married life, died a lingering and painful death, in consequence of injuries received during his army life, leaving his heart-broken wife with Grace, a mere child, and the twins, helpless infants, upon her hands to rear and educate.

The widow's pension, which fortunately was a liberal one, sufficed with the little which they had accumulated to keep actual want from the door, and the delicate hands, which had never been brought up to labor, performed many an unwonted task for pay, and she had managed to struggle along until the children were able to assist her in small ways; but the memory of her soldier husband was ever kept green in her loyal heart, and, though she had received advantageous offers, she had refused them all for his sake.

She had only written once to the grandfather of her children, telling him when and where his son was buried, and opening the way for a reconciliation if he wished it, but he did not reply, and Grace, too, under the pressure of actual need when she saw her beloved mother failing under her burdens, had ventured a little pleading letter, which also went out upon its way, but brought no response.

* * * * * * *

It was evening, and the lamps cast a soft glow over the elegant room which was fitted up for a library in a luxurious home many miles from the widow and her children. One side was filled with a valuable collection of choice books, the other was devoted to rare specimens of art in painting and sculpture, while in a corner niche stood a grand piano, bearing mute testimony to the fact that the room had echoed to music in other days.

The owner of all this luxury sat by a center table, his face buried in his hands, and his eyes fixed upon a letter which lay before him, accompanied by a picture upon which he looked with moistened eyes. It was the widow's letter, and Holroyd Graham looked upon it as one in a dream. "All alone. All alone," he said aloud, at last, "and he whom I relied upon as a staff for my declining years is buried far away from me, and I have never ever seen the spot where he lies, or the faces of those whom he loved most."

He looked sadly about him. "All this wealth and luxury is as empty husks to me in my loneliness, and I would give it all for one look into the honest blue eyes of my boy, one grasp of his warm hand, but I have nothing but his distant grave which other hands than mine will decorate on Memorial Day; others will honor the brave boy whom I sent out from my heart and home for his country's sake."

An indescribable longing came into his heart to see for himself the spot where his son lay, if no more, and to-night, in his softened mood, there was no hardness in his heart toward the widow and the fatherless children of his son. It was not a large town where the widow Graham lived, so it was not a large or imposing procession which filed away to the cemetery on Memorial Day. It had been a patriotic town, as the number of little flags flying above the graves testified.

It was always a sad day for the widow, and to-day she shed bitter tears as the martial music announced that the procession had started for the cemetery.

These sounds always smote upon her ear like a knell, reminding her of the dreadful war times, when father, brother and loved ones were every day adding their names to the roll-call of regiment and companies at the recruiting offices. True, she had been more fortunate than many, being more nearly alone in the world, but even she had seen a beloved father brought home to die, and an invalid mother fade away like a shadow under the affliction, and the fife and drum had a weird, dark memory in its notes for her which time could never efface.

The flowers were lavishly scattered, the salutes were fired and the main body of the procession slowly filed out of the cemetery gates, but still the twins lingered by the grave which they especially loved to honor in memory of the father whose form and face had long since passed from their remembrance. It was a pleasant place to them, shaded by many trees and watered by a purling brook, from which the ground took its name, "Brookside."

Loving hands kept it in neat repair, and rustic seats and jetting fountains made it a pleasant spot in which to spend a meditative hour.

They were picking away a few stray weeds and polishing the white marble of the neat stone which marked the grave, when a stranger appeared; he was tall and erect, with snowy hair and keen eyes, and as he drew near he fixed his gaze on Holly with an eager look which drank in every feature of the boyish face as the thirsty wayfarer drinks from a cooling spring. There was no need to establish the child's identity for every feature proclaimed it, and the old man's eyes filled with tears as he drew near and laid his trembling hand on the sunny head, asking, gently: "What is your name, my son?"

"Holroyd Graham, sir," was the boy's reply, looking up in the still handsome and aristocratic face of the stranger in surprise.

"HOLROYD GRAHAM, SIR."

"And who is this little maid?" lifting Freda's chin and looking earnestly into the brown eyes so like those of the mother.

"This is Freda; sir, and we are twins," replied wondering Holly.

"And where is the mother this lovely day?"

"Mamma is sick, sir, and we are afraid"—and the boyish face contracted with a swift spasm of pain, for even his light heart had become shadowed by the knowledge that soon, only too soon, there would be two graves in the green cemetery to cherish.

"And there is a Grace, too, is there not?" and the stranger's voice grew tender and pitiful as he thought of the little letter in his desk at home, and earnestly wished he had come long ago.

"But Grace must stay with mamma; she coughs so dreadfully we can not leave her alone," replied Freda, timidly.

The unsuspicious children talked on without a thought of concealment, until the tall stranger was in full possession of the family history, with its pitiful struggles and discouragements, so far as they understood them, and even Grace's self-denial in regard to the music lesson was rehearsed.

"And now, my little man, do you know who I am?" he asked aloud.

"A very kind gentleman, I am sure, sir," replied Holly, modestly; his simple little heart had never once guessed at the truth.

"Have you never heard of your Grandfather Graham?"

"Oh, yes, sir, but he is very angry with us all, and has been unkind to us," replied Holly, innocently.

"But he will be unkind no longer," said the old man, eagerly. "I am your grandfather, dear children, and, please God, the past shall be atoned for in the future, and now let us go to mamma and Grace."

"Who can be coming home with the children," said Grace, as she stood in the cottage door shading her eyes with her hand from the brilliant sunlight. She formed a pretty picture, her brown hair floating out in the fresh breeze, her cheeks flushed and her graceful form arrayed in a light dress, plain and cheap to be sure, but tastefully and becomingly made.

Her quick intuition took in the possible identity of the stranger, and fearing the effect of the sudden surprise upon the mother should her surmise prove correct, she stepped out to the gate to meet them.

"Oh, Gracie," cried Holly, "this is grandpa, and we met him at the cemetery."

He put out his slender white hand drawing her to him, and looking at her searchingly. "My dear child, forgive me that I have left you to bear so much alone," he said, gently, as he pressed a kiss on her fresh, young lips.

Grace looked up at the handsome old face through a mist of tears. Was this the stern, cold grand-parent whom she had almost learned to hate? Yes, but stern and cold no longer; the first look into Holly's face, so like the one he had loved so tenderly, had broken down the last shred of prejudice and completed the work which the loneliness of old age and the desolation of his splendid home had commenced in his heart. And Grace, as she saw the tender light in the eyes looking down at her so pityingly, felt all her hard feelings toward him melting away, and longed to weep out the griefs which she had borne so patiently alone upon his friendly bosom.

"Does he come in peace or in anger?" asked the widow, tremulously, when Grace suddenly broke the unexpected news to her.

"In peace, daughter, and anxious to make atonement for the long years of bitterness and neglect in the past," replied the old man, who had heard the question and answered for himself.

This was the beginning of better days for the family; the mother's disease had progressed so far that her case was hopeless, but every thing which wealth and love could procure was provided to alleviate her sufferings, and when at last her spirit took its flight, Holroyd Graham's hand closed the tired eyes and crossed the weary hands over the breast which would never more be disturbed by earthly prejudices, or life's stern necessities.

They laid her beside her soldier husband in Green Brookside, and then the orphans were made ready for a long trip among the mountains to recover from the effects of the long confinement and the griefs and anxieties of the past; and it was nearly autumn before the old home mansion was reached, and the great house echoed once more with young voices, and was brightened by love's warming atmosphere.

The children became the very darlings of their grandfather's heart, and their education, which poverty had seriously interfered with, was resumed with renewed zeal, and Gracie's musical talent in particular was carefully cultivated, though no longer a necessity as a means of support.

There is only one drawback to the completeness of their happiness, and that is the thought that the dear mother can not share it, and Holroyd Graham sighs as he thinks of the many years of happiness which, in his cruel prejudice and unforgiving spirit he has deprived himself of, and also thinks of the many years of privation and suffering he caused the gentle woman whom he came to love so well, before she left him, and the hard and unaccustomed tasks which, through his neglect, the feeble hands were forced to perform, when a tithe of the wealth which he would never have missed, and a little of his love, which should have been hers by right, could have made her life an easy and happy one.

SILLY LITTLE THINGS.

Why Trifle Should Never Be Made the Cause of a Quarrel.

What absurd little things people quarrel about! What trivial matters cause ill-feeling in families! The mutton being roasted too little or the beef too much; an opinion about the temperature of the house or the style of curtains that ought to be bought for the front windows; the definition of a word or its pronunciation, are things that might be argued pleasantly about, but surely are not topics worth a quarrel when peace and good will are of so much importance in the home. A little ill-feeling is like a seed that may grow into a large tree which will shadow the whole house. Many a man and woman must look back with regret on the hasty word or the cold reproach which was the entering wedge that split a household in two, and yet how few make a point of uttering the soft word that turneth away wrath! Quarreling is one of the original sins, I suppose, for the babies sitting on the floor will fall out over their toys, and one will push down the block tower that the other has built with great pains; and there will be a "name called" and a "face made" and a slap given, and mamma will be called to settle a quarrel, and no truth can be got at, for each is right in his own estimation, and each has been wronged by the other. So it is through life. A reasonable quarrel about great matters may be settled, and the parties made friends again; but little tiffs about nothing are such foolish, intangible affairs, that reason can not overcome them.—Christian at Work.

READING FOR THE YOUNG.

AFRAID.

"Last night I played at hide-and-seek
Till I was most too tired to speak,
And, hungry as a little bear—
I couldn't find you anywhere,
And so I went all by myself
For cookies on the pantry shelf.
But, mamma, dear, I was afraid,
It was so dark——" "Why, little maid,
You surely do not mean you fear
The darkness, what could harm you here?"

"I wanted you to go with me
And take a light, so I could see,
I was afraid, if I should go
Without you, that I shouldn't know——"
"But you have often heard me say
The darkness is safe as day.
'Tis very wrong, and foolish, too,
For such a great big girl as you
To fear to go in it alone—
Afraid of what, my little one?"

"Why, just afraid at first, because
I couldn't find the jar—I was,
Dear me!—most dreadfully afraid
There were not any cookies made."

TWO LITTLE BOYS.

Their Unsuccessful Search for a Lost Little Girl Whom They Heard Some One Calling.

Spring had just come. The trees that had looked like old sticks along the city street, and which Timmy and Jack had decided between them ought to have been broken up for kindling, had all of a sudden grown extremely pretty, and were full of birds. After breakfast the two small friends, who were of one size and often of one mind, set out hand-in-hand to take a walk. Jack with the round patch, the size of a saucer, high in the back of his coat, where the bull-dog had grabbed him; and Timmy, with the toes of his shoes cut open, because they never wore out, and his feet would grow.

"I wonder what summer is going to be like," Timmy was asking. "They say it's coming very fast."

"Don't you remember summer?" cried Jack. "I do."

"Well, I begin to remember eating some currants," answered Timmy. "Oh, weren't they sour!"

Both the little boys stopped all of a sudden. Some one had called out, in a startled voice, from one of the windows along the street: "Etta!"

"Never mind, we aren't either of us Etta," said Jack.

"I wonder who she is," mused Timmy.

The voice sounded again, shrill and earnest, calling: "Etta! Etta!" as if the mother of some little girl had lost her, and was getting very much alarmed.

"She must be on the street," said Timmy. "I don't see her mother's head sticking out, but the window's open. See that girl 'way down the sidewalk, there. I guess that is Etta, Jack."

"What a naughty girl to scare her mother so!" exclaimed Jack. "Let us go and tell her to come home."

As they scurried along on their errand, the voice rang out again and again, calling the missing child, until it seemed as if every body ought to join in the search for her.

"Etta! Etta!"

When the little girl was accosted by Timmy and Jack, who said "Hallo!" to her, and then stopped and stared at her, she looked out from her very big hat with astonished eyes, and would not answer at all.

"Your mother's calling you, Etta," Jack informed her. "Don't you hear her? I do, even from here."

"My name isn't Etta," remarked the little girl, whirling round till her back was turned toward them, and then looking over her shoulder. "Perhaps you think me a ninny; but I never was one yet." And with these words, she danced off down the sidewalk, gayly.

The two boys sat themselves on a doorstep and asked each other questions they neither of them could answer, as to what they were to do in order to find Etta.

"It might be well to call her ourselves," said Timmy. "May be she'd mind us better than she does her mother. You shout first."

A number of people looked out of their windows as the boys proceeded through the street, making the name of Etta sound clear and shrill as they went, while the echo still rang high in air behind them from the house the child had left, where the female voice called and called.

However, no little girl responded to all this noise—and all at once Timmy made a sound which caused Jack to look round at him. He was crying:

"She's lost," he sobbed; "and we can never, never find her!"

Jack put his kind little arm about Timmy's neck, which was very awkward for them both, and they nearly tripped each other up, especially as Timmy could not see where he was going for his tears.

"There's a little girl with a hat on at one of those windows," Jack announced. "We'll stop and ask her if she is Etta; and I guess she ran in there to make a call on some other little girl—named Jenny, I guess."

Accordingly the boys stopped under the open window, quite persuaded now that their search was successful, and told her that her mother was calling her, and wouldn't wait for her any longer.

The little girl at the window quickly disappeared, and soon opened the door of the house, and came out.

"You have frightened them very much at your home," said Timmy, reproachfully. "They think something has happened to you."

The girl was starting off on a run, when Jack exclaimed:

"Why, that's not the way! Don't you know where you live, you funny-thing?"

"Of course I do!" she replied, stopping in amazement. "Who are you, if you please?" And away she sped, in entirely the opposite direction from that of the high voice which could still be faintly heard in the distance.

"The fact is," cried Jack, "that we can never find her, Tim. No wonder they keep on calling her, for I don't believe even a policeman could tell where she's gone."

"Do you think she has yellow hair, or brown hair?" asked Timmy, as if that made any difference in a little girl whom they were going to see.

"Yellow hair," replied Jack, positively. "Let us go to her house, and tell them we can not make out which way she has run."

Accordingly, the boys pounded their noisy little heels towards the spot whence they had first come, and rang the bell of the house they had heard the voice calling from.

"Are you sure this is the right one?" said Timmy, after they had waited a minute.

"Why, yes," Jack answered. "That big cage hanging way up on the wall there was something I noticed."

The door opened, and a thin woman looked down at the two boys as if she thought them a couple of straying kittens.

"We've been looking for her," said Jack.

"And it's no use; she's not any where around here," added Tim, sorrowfully.

"What do you mean?" asked the thin woman, ready to get provoked in another instant.

"Why, has Etta come home," inquired Jack, leaning up against the door-jamb as if for a good long chat.

"Take your nose away; I'm going to bang the door to," exclaimed the woman, testily.

"Weren't you calling 'Etta! Etta?'" Timmy demanded, pouting.

"Etta!" rang out once more, like a bell under the sunny blue sky.

The woman stepped out and looked up.

"If it isn't the parrot the new lodger brought!" she cried. "My! Don't it speak naturally, though!"

Then she began to laugh, and slapped Timmy and Jack on the shoulders, laughing more and more, and at last saying, while they stared at her bewildered: "So you thought some body had lost 'Etta;' did you? Why, you stupid owlets, it was only the parrot talking to himself. There never was any Etta in this house."

When she had departed, Timmy and Jack looked at each other, but said nothing.

It was as much as a week afterward that Timmy burst out, as if he must unburden his heart of its secret perplexity, whether Jack scoffed at him or not: "Jack, I believe the little girl is somewhere in the world; don't you?"

At first Jack wouldn't answer; but he colored up, turning away.

"That voice is calling her still," he admitted. "I guess the parrot knows more than that thin woman does."—Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, in S. S. Times.

Sammie's Reminder.

Little Sammie's grandma had taught him to talk in the following manner. She would have him repeat after her the different words. For instance, she would say: "Now, Sammie, you say: 'Grandma, I'll be a very good boy,'" and Sammie would say it over after her.

At last, Sammie reached the dignity of two years; and could talk pretty well, stumbling only once in a while over some big word.

One day Sammie was allowed to spend the morning with some of his little neighbors. It was in maple-sugar time, and the kind lady of the house brought out a piece for each, as she supposed.

But in some way Sammie did not receive his piece. He waited just as long as human nature would permit, and then, walking up to Mrs. Rice, said:

"Auntie Rice, say to me: 'Sammie, dear, wouldn't you like a piece of maple-sugar, too?'"

Auntie Rice said this to him as he requested, and he bravely answered:

"Yes'm, if you please."

Whereupon he received the largest piece of all, and enjoyed it heartily.—Youth's Companion.

A Dream of Infinity.

"If we could double the space-penetrating power of our telescopes," speculates Proctor, "we should probably much more than double, we should increase manifold, the number of stars—that is of suns—which would be brought within our ken. Not thousands of millions, but probably millions of millions, of suns exist within the limits of the sidereal system. Rather—I ought to say—they exist within the limits of our sidereal system, for doubtless this system is no more to be regarded as single within the universe than our solar system is unique within the star depths. Every star tells us of a sun, and probably of a solar system, in such sort that we must recognize thousands of millions of solar systems in the galaxy. May we not fairly assume, then, that in like manner our sidereal system is repeated millions and millions of times within some system of a higher order? That system may in turn be repeated many millions of times within a system of a higher order. And so on, to higher and higher orders, absolutely without end."

Value of Cheerfulness.

I hold the deepest and most unqualified respect for any person who is habitually cheerful.

Though he be plain to ugliness and ignorant to boorishness, or though he be as poverty-stricken as the proverbial "Job's turkey," if he is naturally and thoroughly and heartily cheerful, he has more of the true principal of earthly happiness than was ever extracted from the mines of Ophir.

Under Dickens' pen the irrepressible Micawber became a hero and a philosopher, not from any marked achievement or talent, but purely from the man's supreme ability to face the most humiliating reverses with the same serene, unruffled exterior.

What sugar is to coffee, is a cheerful man to the neighborhood in which he lives. While the society of which he is only a single member is self-sustaining and independent without him, it is much the pleasanter for being generally flavored by his influence. And who does not know about the "world of good" it does us when a score of small annoyances set in a tide against us, to hear the hearty laugh and look into the wholesome face of our cheerful neighbor?

A talented author once said that a cheerful disposition was more essential than talent. A sweeping assertion, but who admires talent in a human porcupine. Soundly sensible people prefer less talent and more geniality.

The man who entertains you for an hour with a statement of his colds and his headaches, his losses and crosses, and ends with an excrutiating report from the dyspeptic locality, is invariably a sullen, grumbling misanthrope.

Beyond a doubt laughter is healthy. Whenever we are thoroughly pleased, we are in a measure nourished. Hence the old maxim, "Laugh and grow fat.

All really healthy people are likely to be good humored, and good humored people are quite as likely to be strong in spirit.

Kind words and smiles and genial greetings and good wishes are seeds that thrive and bear fruit each after its own kind.

Cheerfulness is like the widow's measure of meal; the more is spent the more remains, and both the receiver and giver are enriched.

Jovial sweet tempered, pure hearted people are charitable; they are not jealous. They are sweet, their opposites are the bitter; the two elements combine and make the social world a bitter sweet; unfortunately, the flavor of the bitter is most powerful.

Emigration From the Old World.

Now that the Presidential campaign is near, the emigration question looms up once more. Of course emigrants who have just landed can't vote, but there are plenty of others who will soon be ready to.

From all that can be learned the old world continues to flood America with its superfluous population. To get some facts on the subject a Telegram reporter interviewed Castle Garden officials to-day. Superintendant Jackson said:

"We have an unusual number of German emigrants this year. As a rule they will remain in the city, though many will ultimately go to Pennsylvania. The arrivals for 1888 are largely in excess of the those for 1887. In January, February and March last year we had 50,730 arrivals. For the same months this year there were 54,282 arrivals. There have already been 14,908 arrivals this month,

"The Italians have the call as to numbers so far; indeed they were more numerous last year than any other nation. Next come the Germans, Russians, Swedes, Austrians, and lastly English. Forty-five per cent of the emigrants locate in this State. Last month we sent 4,000 emigrants to Pennsylvania and 2,500 to Illinois. Minnesota, Michigan and Iowa in the order named, are the States most favored by emigrants. Very few go to California."—N. Y. Telegram.

A Persian Legend.

It is related of a Persian mother, on giving her son forty pieces of silver as his portion, that she made him swear never to tell a lie, and said: "Go, my son, I consign thee to God; and we shall not meet here again till the Day of Judgment."

The youth went away, and the party he traveled with were assaulted by robbers. One fellow asked the boy what he had, and he answered with a candor that surprised his questioner:

"Forty dinars are sewed up in my garments."

The robber laughed, thinking the boy jested. Another asked him the same question and received the same answer. At last the chief called him and asked him what he had. The boy replied:

"I have told two of your people already that I have forty dinars sewed up in my clothes."

The chief ordered his clothes to be ripped open and the money was found.

"And how came you to tell this?"

"Because," replied the boy, "I would not be false to my mother, whom I solemnly promised never to tell a lie."

"Child," said the chief, "art thou so mindful of thy duty to thy mother, while I am insensible, at my age, of the duty I owe to God? Give me thy hand, that I may swear repentance on it." He did so, and his followers were struck with the scene.

"You have been our leader in guilt," they said to the chief; "be the same in the paths of virtue." And taking the boy's hand, they took the oath of repentance on it.

"You have never broken bread with me, my pastor." "No; you have never asked me." "Do you wait to be asked?" "Certainly; do you break bread with people without being asked?" "But the case with you is different; you are my pastor." "True, I am your pastor, and as such as I preach to you and visit you, giving you my sympathy, loving interest and prayers. These offices grow out of my relation to you, and therefore they are performed. But to breakfast, dine or sup with you, is a different matter; is contingent entirely upon your wishes and my convenience." "Well I have wished all along that you would take a meal with us." "Excuse me. I don't think you have wished it very much." "Why?" "Because if you had desired it you would have said so." "Well, I tell yon now I desire it. Will you come?" "When?" "At any time." "No.' "Why not?" "Because you are too indefinite. I might come at a time you would be from home.', "Well, come and take tea with us to-morrow evening." "All right; I will come with pleasure."—The Methodist Protestant.

CONSTIPATION

IS called the "Father of Diseases," because there is no medium through which disease so often attacks the system as by the absorption of poisonous gases in the retention of decayed and effete matter in the stomach and bowels. It is caused by a Torpid Liver, not enough bile being excreted from the blood to produce Nature's own cathartic, and is generally accompanied with such results as

Loss of Appetite,
Sick Headache,
Bad Breath, etc.

The treatment of Constipation does not consist merely in unloading the bowels. The medicine must not only act as a purgative, but be a tonic as well, and not produce after its use greater costiveness. To secure a regular habit of body without changing the diet or disorganizing the system

"My attention, after suffering with Constipation for two or three years, was called to Simmons Liver Regulator, and, having tried almost everything else, concluded to try it. I first took a wineglassful and afterwards reduced the dose to a teaspoonful, as per directions, after each meal. I found that it had done me so much good that I continued it until I took two bottles. Since then I have not experienced any difficulty. I keep it in my house and would not be without it, but have no use for it, it having cured me."—GEO. W. SIMS, Ass't Clerk Superior Court, Bibb Co., Ga.

THE HUMMING TOP.

Count Geierflug, the mightiest minister of the realm, had breathed his last. His final moments on earth had left him looking somewhat pale and worn, but had in no respect diminished his pride and aristocratic elegance of bearing. Attired in a gold embroidered coat, such as men of his distinction are apt to wear when lying in funeral state, he started off on the direct road to heaven.

Marching along at a brisk pace, he presently overtook and passed a little group, consisting of three most wretched beings; a white-haired, palsied old pauper woman, a youth from whose neck still dangled the halter which he had brought with him from the closing scenes of his life dramma, and a poor little hump-backed consumptive boy, 5 or 6 years old, from time to time, glanced lovingly at a toy clasped close in his hand.

Count Geierflug arrived at the gates of heaven, and politely addressed St. Peter:

"Pardon me" he began, "I would merely beg to squire——"

But the former apostle and present keeper of the celestial gates interrupted him sternly:

"It's not your turn. The three behind there, whom you passed on the road, come first."

"Before me? I am Count Geierflug, the Prime Miniser. I have the title of Excellency, am knight of innumerable orders, member of various learned societies—and——"

"Up here we recognize neither knight nor scholar."

"Yet your reverence was a kind of knight yourself, and wielded a dashing blade in the affair with Malchus."

Peter silently regarded the smiling speaker.

"And your reverance was also a quasi scholar—or author—or—"

"On earth I was only a poor fisherman."

"And yet," continued the Count, with a profound bow, "your reverence's Epistles are even more celebrated than the world renowned letter of Mme. de Sevigne."

Again Peter surveyed the flatterer in utter silence, but with so penetrating a gaze that the false courtier's eyes dropped beneath it.

In the meantime, the three pilgrims had arrived.

No sooner did St. Peter see the boy's innocent face and crippled body than he said kindly:

"Run in, little one. This is the right place for you."

The apostle then turned to a thick book upon which, in golden letters, stood "Ledger."

"What is your name?" he asked the old woman.

"Brigitte Stegmaierin, if you please holy St. Peter," she replied with a courtesy.

"Precisely—Brigitte Stegmaierin," replied St. Peter, pouring over his ledger. Then, in a grumbling tone, he continued:

"Debit: 'Has a bitter bad tongue of her own.' While, charged to her credit: 'She is wretchedly poor.'"

"Poor!" cried the old crone, weeping and flinging up her arms; "God is my witness that is true; and the holy Saint Peter himself knows that poverty is a gnawing pain."

"Well, well," said the apostle gently; "go in, granny—go in. In there there is no more poverty or pain."

The young man with a halter around his neck now stepped forward.

"Your name?" demanded St. Peter.

"Veit Kratzern."

"Stole a gold bracelet," read the apostle, with a frown.

"Item: A purse full of money.

"Item: The contents of the contribution box of St. Jame's Church."

St. Peter scowled fiercely at the youth, who shook like a leaf in the blast.

"Credited: 'He did it all at the instigation and entreaty of his sweetheart.' H'm! Did you love the woman so very much?"

"Ah!" faltered the boy, "I could never tell you how much! I"—

"Enough!" broke in St. Peter. "Don't talk to me about it. Be off, will you? out of my sight."

"What! In there?" and the thief pointed towards the gates.

"Well—yes. Only make haste or I may repent my weakness."

Thro' the briefly opened portals the fair forms and pitiful faces of two shining angels were revealed. One of them tenderly wiped the tears from poor old Brigitte's eyes, while the other, murmuring mild and compassionate words, removed the rope from Veit Kratzern's neck.

"Now we are ready for you," remarked St. Peter to the Count, turning over leaf after leaf of the ledger, and suddenly exclaiming in a horrible tone:

"That looks promising indeed! Column after column of debit items while nothing stands to your credit—absolutely nothing!"

The Count began pompously:

"I have advanced the commerce, manufactures and agriculture of my native land. I have protected and promoted the arts and sciences. I have built churches and schools and orphan asylums and hospitals and poor-houses and—",

"Peace, fool!" cried Saint Peter, angrily. "All that is charged fast enough, not to your credit but against you, because it was done from ambition and selfishness and ostentation and hypocrisy."

"My life's best work," continued the Count, still more proudly, "how I made my fatherland great and glorious beyond all lands on earth! I do not need to mention, for I presume my fame has long ago ascended here."

"Your fame," retorted Saint Peter, with increasing indignation, has not reached us, but the groans of dying youths have risen to us from your battle-fields, and from desolate homes the despair of mothers and brides; and I tell you, wretch, if you have nothing better than this to urge, you are a lost man!"

The Count grew still paler, and had not a word to say for himself.

At this moment the little boy, lingering on the threshold of heaven called out:

"Mr. Peter! Mr. Peter!"

"Are you still there, my little man?" returned the apostle. "Why do you not enter?"

Instead of replying to the question the little fellow said:

"Mr. Peter, do you see this humming top." Saint Peter returned indulgently, "Pray, how came it here?"

"My mother laid it in my grave with me," answered the child seriously. He then picked up his top, rewound the string, and extending the top temptingly toward the apostle, said:

"Mr. Peter, if you will let the Count go in there with me I will let you spin my top."

"Do you know the Count, child?"

"Of course. It was the Count that gave me the top."

"Ah! Tell me how that happened, dear boy."

"Once I was sitting at the door, eating my bread, and when I had finished I began to cry. Just then the Count came driving along in a beautiful blue and gold coach, with four grey horses. And the carriage stopped and the Count said:

"'Are you hungry, little boy?'

"'No,' said I, 'I have just had my broad.'

"'And the Count said, 'Then why are you crying?'

"And then I said, 'I am so lonely. Father and mother go off to work early in the morning, and don't come home till late at night, and the children won't play with me because I am so slow.' Then the Count said he would bring him something to play with. And in a little while he came back with the top, and we made it spin, the Count and I together; after that I never cried any more."

Saint Peter made no reply, but buried his head in his ledger muttering:

"I knew he's rather old fogyish in his account, our old bookkeeper, Gabriel—still we have always been able to rely on him—ah, I was sure of it!" he exclaimed joyfully; "here it is on the very last credit page;

"Gave a day laborer's crippled child a toy—commonly called a humming-top—and with great kindness and gentleness showed the boy how to spin it."

With almost youthful eagerness Saint Peter seized his red pencil and drew a broad line through the whole long list of sins and offenses, and the next moment the Count, clasping the child's hand, entered the kingdom of heaven.—Translated from German.

A Western Wedding.

It appears that one Jonas Burton had been chosen justice of the peace of one of the small Wyoming towns not because he was posessed of any special qualifications for the office, but on account of his personal magnetism, which had about it all those qualities which go to make the yellow dog a thing of beauty and a joy forever to the lovers of pure cussedness. Among other functions of his office the Hon. Jonas one day found himself called upon to join in "bonds of padlock," as matrimony is sometimes called in the West, a raw young couple from the country. His honor was appalled at the situation. He could commit a horse thief to the gallows with all the elegance and impressiveness of manner which the act demanded. He could sentence a man to jail for life for holding five aces in his hand at poker, without turning a hair, but as for "marryin' folks," he wasn't in it, by goshlemity! But as justice of the peace, he had to do it, and his perturbation of spirit was dreadful to witness.

About an hour before the ceremony was to take place the correspondent, accompanied by one of the leading citizens of the place, a Mr. Stiles, went to the old 'Squire's cabin, and found him poring over a large volume of the statutes of Wyoming, sweating like a horse, and looking very anxious. After greeting his callers, he said:

"Stiles, the derned galoots that got up these yer laws hasn't gumption enough to last them over night. I've run through the blamed book a half dozen times, and can't find a dod blasted word about matermony, or how the hitchin' process is proceeded with. I've just got to put the clamps on this couple, hit or miss, an' ef I don't yoke 'em up legal I can't help it."

"Oh," said stiles, "just do the best you can. Any kind of a ceremony will do in this country, for people never question the legality of the thing. I'll post you as well as I can."

Stiles then explained to him about how he should proceed, and the old man thought finally he could worry through it. Ere long the couple appeared, followed by a crowd of the citizens of the camp. The candidates stood up before the old squire, who said:

"Fellar citizens, this yar man and this yar woman have appeared before the court to be hitched in the legal bonds of wedlock. If any galoot in the mob knows anything that mout block the game ef took to a higher court, let him now toot his bazoo, or else keep his jaw to himself now and forevermore. All in favor of me preceedin' as authorized by law, say 'I.'"

Everybody said "I."

"Contrary, 'No.'"

Nobody said "No."

"The motion is carried unanimously, an' the court rules that there hain't nuthin' to prevent the tryin' of the case. Grip your fins." The candidates joined hands. "Amos Peabody, do you solemnly swa'ar that ye'll freeze to 'Mandy fureyer and ever? That ye'll love 'er an' pervide fur 'er, an' treat 'er square an' white, accordin' to the rules and regulations sot down to govern sich cases in the United States, so help yer God?"

"Yaas, sir; I do, sir."

"That fixes your end o' ther bargain. Mendy Thomas, do you solemnly swear that ye'll hang onto Amos for all comin' time; that ye'll nuss him in sickness and be square to him in wellness; that ye'll be to him a good, tru, honest, up-an'-up wife to him, under the penalties prescribed by the laws for the punishment of sich offenses; do you swa'ar this, so help yer God?"

"I swar I will."

"Then, by the power invested in me as justice o' the peace in an' fur this precinct, I pronounce you, Amos Peabody, husband, an' you, Mandy Thomas, wife, an' egalize ye to remain as sich now and forevermore; an' ye'll stand committed till the fees an' costs in the case be paid in full, an' may God have mercy on your souls an' bless this union with his healthiest blessin's."

The fees and costs were adjusted, and after receiving the congratulations of the assembly, the newly made husband and wife departed for their cabin up the creek.

It is difficult to avoid making an exception of ourselves when we are reflecting upon the errors and frailties of mankind. Said a Quaker, one day, to his wife:

"All the world is queer, excepting thee and me, and thee is a little queer."

Another candid and self-righteous individual, in a moment of confidence, gave vent to the opinion:

"There's but two honest men in this town. Brother B—— and myself; and sometimes I have my doubts of Brother B——!"

MEMORIAL DAY.

Far down midst Southern mountains
Where lonely pine-trees stand,
And where the silvery mist-like moss
Has laid its soft gray hand,
Where through the silent forest
No voice e'er echoes, save
The sweet wild song of birds that throng,
There lies a soldier's grave.

And no stone tells the story,
And no words tell his name,
And in the list of battles fought
He bears no share of fame.
His was the soldier's spirit
To do and dare and die,
But not for him in the forest dim
The shout of victory.

"Died on the march!" the saddest
Words that a comrade writes;
As brave a soldier, though, as he
Who in the front rank fights;
For him no drums are muffled,
Nor pomp, nor funeral signs.
But comrades tried who marched beside Laid him beneath the pines

When we, through all the country,
Honor the soldier dead,
And wreaths of choicest flowers are brought
And words of praise are said—
Far off amid the mountains
Who marks the grave so lone?
Will no one make for soldier's sake
A wreath—a prayer—not one?

Ah, yes! for tender Nature
Loves well to mark the spot,
And over all that lonely mound
She strews forget-me-not—
She knew with what true courage
His fresh young life he gave,
And flowers whose eyes reflect the skies
Each year sends to his grave.

What matter if that soldier
Did wear the Blue or Gray,
For brave and strong must be the heart
That gives its life away.
Not theirs alone the glory
Who share the battle's din,
A hero he who valiantly
Meets death though others win.

While we with martial music
Honor the soldier's name,
Unfuri the flag and deck the graves
Of those who earned its fame,
On many lonely hill-sides,
By forest, vale and sea,
There Nature brings her offerings
That none unmarked may be.

REUNITED.

Story of a Man's Repentance and a Woman's Forgiveness.

During the autumn of '86, the weather was remarkably pleasant all over the Western States till the middle of the month of November. Up to that time men worked out of doors in their shirt-sleeves, and women continued to wear sun-bonnets just as in midsummer. But the 16th dawned cold and gray, and the wind, which is always astir in this section of the country, was sharp and keen. Still nobody expected a storm of very great severity, as a raw, cloudy day is not infrequent at this season of the year, and just as frequently it comes and goes unheeded, save to cause one to put on an extra garment for the day and lay it aside again on the morrow when the sun shines out brightly as ever. But then, no one in this slipshod West ever does expect a storm till it comes on and finds them unprepared. Some way the idea that the winters are not going to be severe and don't open up till late is so fixed in the brain of the average settler that he wouldn't be ready for cold weather if he didn't begin till the following season, and when it comes and finds them napping—oh, what a rustling there is to "fix things up a little for the cold snap. 'Done, declare!' who'd 'a thought winter'd a set in right away so soon.'"

The more shiftless never make any provision for their cattle during the severe weather unless it be a straw stack for them to stand against in case of a blizzard. At other times they are expected to rustle their living on the buffalo grass. This is a short, woolly growth which is popularly believed to contain an oily, nutritious substance for the animals. Many of the poor creatures die of starvation, and those which do manage to pull through are so poor by spring that it takes three of them standing together to cast a respectable shadow.

On this particular day, it did not clear off as was expected; on the contrary the clouds became denser as the day wore on, the wind rose to a perfect gale, and toward night a sleety rain set in.

"It's going to be a bad night, mother. What will we do with Cherry's calf? 'Twon't do to let it stand out," said Julian Ashley, coming from the stable where he had been "doing the chores," just at nightfall on the memorable 16th.

"We'll have to put it in the back room in the hen-house till we can get a place fixed," replied the mother. "I'll come and help."

There are usually exceptions to a rule, and Mrs. Ashley was the exception to the general rule of shiftlessness in her neighborhood. Her neighbors claimed that this was due to her pocket-book being better filled than theirs; but when did laziness ever fail to invent an excuse behind which to screen itself? The fact of her purse being longer than theirs was due to her providing food and shelter for her stock—which is the greatest source of revenue on a claim—thus increasing the profit and doing away with the losses which impoverished her neighbors.

The calf having been induced with many a "Sook bossie," "Huay there," and an occasional twist of its caudal appendage, to enter the dark hen-house and allow itself to be tied to the center-post, Mrs. Ashley took a final survey of the animals in the sheds and stables to see that all were as comfortable as they could be under the circumstances, then she and Julian each carried in a scuttle of coal, closed the door and pulled the rug before it to keep the cold from coming in at the bottom.

The house was a long, low structure, as sod houses usually are, and was half "dug-out." It, like the out-buildings, was better than the generality. It contained three rooms, and not only had board floors, but they were carpeted and the walls were papered. It also had a shingle roof which, much as it may astonish you to find it out, my Eastern friends, is a luxury not enjoyed by the common herd of homesteaders. A board roof with sod laid over it to keep out the rain is considered fine, but people who go to the extent of sporting shingle roofs on their dwellings are considered "way up," in Western parlance.

The houses are usually covered in this wise. A ridge-log is laid from one end wall to the other, supported in the center by a log with a crotch on the upper end, standing perpendicularly. Small poles are then placed at a distance of two feet apart, one end of each resting upon a side wall, the other upon the ridge-log. This constitutes the frame work. Willows are then laid thickly across the poles, a layer of buffalo-sod, added, and the entire roof covered with dirt a foot thick.

Board floors are another luxury not enjoyed by the majority, "dirt floors" being the rule. That is, the earth enclosed within the four walls is leveled down as smoothly as possible with a spade, and considered quite good enough. It is no uncommon occurrence to see people who own hundreds of heads of cattle and three or four sections of land living in sod houses—or even "dug-outs" sometimes, with dirt roofs and dirt floors—buildings which Eastern farmers would not consider fit to winter stock in. This being the usual style of living among the pioneers of Nebraska, of course when Mrs. Ashley took a claim and fixed it up so much better than the surrounding ones, it was no wonder that she was at once set apart by her neighbors as being "too fine-haired for any thing."

Perhaps it was owing to this, or, it may have been because she never encouraged familiarity with her neighbors, that she had not a single intimate acquaintance among them, after living in the vicinity over five years. She had made proof on a pre-emption at the end of the first six months of her residence there and had immediately placed a homestead filing on a quarter section adjacent to her tree-claim. That she had considerable stock and was making money was all any of her neighbors knew of her. Even the people whom she hired to do her work knew nothing more, except that she was never backward or afraid of putting her own shoulder to the wheel when work was pressing.

She had a boy, twelve years of age at the time of which we write, and a girl three years younger. To any inquiries concerning her husband, she invariably replied:

"I lost him many years ago."

One hired girl, more daring than the rest, ventured to continue the subject in spite of her mistress' forbidding looks when the matter was alluded to by inquiring:

"What ailed him?"

"Heart disease," replied the lady, while a grim smile rested on her face, as she went outside and closed the door to end the conversation.

She was a handsome woman, not over thirty-one or two years of age, and several of the bachelors of the vicinity had made advances with a view to matrimony, all of which were politely, but firmly, repulsed. She always declared she was opposed to second marriages. The truth of the matter was that, owing to a sad experience, she did not have much faith in men, or in marriage of any kind, whether second or first.

She had passed her girlhood in a country village in the vicinity of Chillicothe, Ohio, and at seventeen had become engaged to Ashley Winthrop, a rising young lawyer of that city. Her acquaintances thought she had married extremely well—but she hadn't. She had become acquainted with young Winthrop while he was rusticating in the village. She, being the belle there, he engaged her in what he at first intended to be a flirtation; but before he knew it he was more interested in her than he had intended, and when it came time to leave, some way it was so easy to ask permission to come back for her some time. She seemed to look and long for some such proposal, too, and he could not but acknowledge to himself that she had a right to do so, after their intimacy. Yet he had never meant things to go so far, and knew that it was not for the best. She was too thoroughly a country girl to bear transplanting to the city. She was not the sort of woman he had always looked forward to marrying, yet so proud was he of what he termed his "honor," that, galling as the bondage would be to him, he would not make a clean breast of it, and end matters between them. So they were married and went to Chillicothe to live. If her unassuming country ways annoyed him before, when there was no one but himself to note them, how much more so now that all his friends could witness them. She soon learned that her husband was ashamed of her, and this made matters even worse, for she tried to please him by affecting the fine lady, and made a miserable failure of it.

To a man of domestic tastes only she would have proven a treasure. Her house was the best ordered, and her table afforded dainties unsurpassed. But her husband overlooked her virtues entirely, in contemplating what he considered her deficiences. He avoided taking her out with him whenever it was possible, and made both himself and his wife miserable.

When they were married five years, Mr. Winthrop was elected to the Legislature, and, of course, never offered to take his wife to Columbus with him when he went, which was a bad move for both. Having no one to look after, and no one to look after him, he had too much time for getting into mischief. At the same hotel at which he was stopping a Senator from a northern district was also boarding, accompanied by his daughter.

It is hardly likely that a man so tenacious of his honor that he would fulfill a distasteful contract of marriage for its sake, would willfully withhold the fact of his marriage and enter into a flirtation; so, perhaps, the opportunity for disclosing the fact never presented itself. However that may have been, certain it is that Ashley Winthrop soon began to seek the society of Senator Seely's daughter, Louise, and acknowledge to himself that, if he were only free, here was the woman he would choose for a wife.

And the girl? Why, she was flattered by the evident interest and admiration of the bright young member from Chillicothe; enjoyed his society at first, and later on—why will women be such fools?—proceeded to fall head and ears in love with him without so much as trying to find out any thing about his past life. Her father, also, rather encouraged the intimacy, taking it for granted that a young man whose fellow-citizens respected him enough to elect him to the legislature must be all right. (This goes to prove, by the way, that men are not always as acute as they ought to be, either.)

No mutual agreement as to the state of their hearts was arrived at in so many words, but each knew the other's feelings intuitively. The only reference made to the subject was in parting. Then, as Ashley held her hand and noted her look of regret at the separation, he said earnestly:

"Much as I have enjoyed your society, I trust we may never meet again."

"Why?" she asked, opening her eyes wide in pained surprise.

"Because—oh, Louise! Can't you understand why? I've been a fool—aye, worse than that!"

"I don't understand," she said huskily, as a feeling of foreboding crept over her heart.

"I can't explain it now. I could not face you and acknowledge my own villainy."

Just then others entered the room and they parted without further explanation. When he came home again he was more than ever dissatisfied with his wife, and seriously thought of committing suicide to end his misery—never dreaming that he was one of the most favored mortals on whom the sun shone if he had only been sensible enough to realize it. He considered that he owed Louise an explanation, besides he longed to write to her and perhaps receive a reply, anyway; so he wrote a long account of his former courtship, his unhappy marriage, present miserable state increased by his ardent affection for herself, and ended by describing the obstacle to their union as a being utterly devoid of the finer sensibilities, with a soul not aspiring beyond housework. He was writing this epistle in his office, and just as he was about to close, who should step in but his wife. He thrust the letter hurriedly into a book and turned with a very embarrassed countenance to greet her. Her suspicions and curiosity were roused at once, and she invented an excuse for sending him out, possessed herself of the letter and read it in his absence, then wrote below his last line:

"No need to send this. The objectionable 'obstacle' will be removed by first train to Malvern Crossing. LUCY MALVERN-WINTHROP."

Then placed the letter again where she had found it.

Some women would have fainted, some would have cried, it is safe to say that nine out of ten would have made a scene, but Lucy was that tenth one who will suffer and make no sign. She chatted pleasantly for five minutes or more with her husband when he returned, quite as though nothing had happened, then picked up her purchases and started home. When she reached the street, however, her self control began to ebb. She worked off some of her excitement by walking home, as if her life depended on her speed, and when once there, she gathered up what things she had brought when she came there a bride, packed them and her own and her child's clothing, called a dray and had them removed to the depot, and was on her way to Malvern Crossing before her husband had succeeded in getting rid of two clients who had come in as Lucy went out, so as to finish his letter. When at last he was alone again he drew the missive forth, feeling guilty as a thief, as he remembered how near his wife had come to detecting his in his treachery. But when he read her [illegible] at the bottom of the page, he was [illegible] But he must stop her going. Shame, contrition, fear of scandal all working [illegible] him at once, lent rather a hang-dog appearance to him as he entered his own house. Every thing was topsy-turvy for the first time since he was married. He began to realize too late at least one of his wife's virtues. Finding her gone he took the next train in pursuit and found her in her father's parlor, and there made his confession and apology and promises to never do so again—without avail, however. After hearing him through and listening to his petition that she return to him, she said scornfully:

"Not for worlds!"

"Not if you could offer her a kingdom should she return to you, you rascal!" exclaimed her father. "Ain't you a pretty specimen of mankind, leaving your wife at home and galvanting round the country making masses on other women! I am able and willing to support my daughter, and the sooner you get out of my house the better. And, mind you, don't show your face here again. Famoose!"

Here he emphasized with his cane in such a manner that his son-in-law thought best to retire.

He waited a week, expecting their anger to cool, then went back again. His father-in-law met him at the gate and threatened to have him arrested if he ever came on his farm again. So he troubled them no more.

Eight months later, Lucy gave birth to a girl, and, with the inconsistency of a woman, named it Louise. Two years later, she was notified of her husband's application for a divorce, and a little later she read of his marriage to "Louise, eldest daughter of Senator Seely." Her father was dead by this time, so she decided to move West. Not wishing ever to know or be known by any former acquaintances, she changed her own and children's name to Ashley, and under this cognomen we find them, several years later, located on a homestead in Western Nebraska, as mentioned in the beginning of our story.

The hired man and girl who worked for Mrs. Ashley, and were brother and sister, had been called away the morning of the 16th to the sick-bed of their mother; so only herself and the children were at home. Julian studied his lesson, and little Louise practiced her music while the mother crocheted.

The wind howled and the sleet came against the windows with such force it seemed it would break them. Suddenly, in the midst of the roaring, there came a sound just outside the window like the neighing of a horse. They listened, and in a minute it sounded again.

"It must be one of the ponies loose. Something must be wrong at the stables. Light the lantern and we'll go and see," said Mrs. Ashley, putting on her wraps.

When they opened the door and looked out, there stood a buggy with two horses attached, and in the buggy the figure of a man.

"Hello!" called Julian.

No response.

It's somebody lost in the storm," said the mother. "Perhaps he's frozen. It's a good thing I left the curtain up; the ponies must have seen the light and instinct led them to it. Here, let's see if we can lift him."

They got the man into the house, and the ponies stabled as quickly as possible. Then, finding that life was not extinct, they applied all the remedies they had at hand to restore him. By and by he began to show signs of animation, and after a long time opened his eyes. They wandered around in a puzzled manner until they lightened upon Mrs. Ashley's face. Then with a glad cry, the stranger leaned forward.

"Lucy!" he cried. "Is it only a horrible dream?"

"A horribly real dream," she replied, icily, recognizing in the man before her, for the first time, her husband.

"Don't be hard with me, Lucy; I remember now, I deserve every thing harsh, but if you knew all, you would pity and forgive. Believe me, Lucy, I learned too late, what a jewel you were in comparison with any other woman I ever saw."

"How about Louise?" questioned Mrs. Ashley.

"Didn't you ever hear? She led me a miserable life, and we quarreled, and she used to fly at me like a mad creature. She finally ran away with a bank cashier. I wasn't sorry that she went, either. I had been drinking and my credit was gone, and I was so down in the world that I didn't care for the disgrace. I've hunted for you ever since, but I had given up all hopes of finding you. I think Providence must have directed me here. I was over by Culbertson looking at a piece of land to-day, and I tried to make it back to McCook, but the blizzard overtook me, and the horses wouldn't face it, so we drifted here. My money, friends and reputation are gone, and I'm going to take a claim and settle down and try again. You must help me to redeem myself, Lucy. I've been a terrible scoundrel, but I've paid dearly for all my misdeeds."

To repeat all that was said by this man and woman, who had once been husband and wife, would fill a volume. The main subject dwelt upon by Ashley Winthrop was a plea for forgiveness and a remarriage. Had he returned in the full tide of prosperity, it is doubtful whether any arguments could have prevailed with Lucy; as it was, however, pity for his misfortune and fallen condition, the knowledge that he needed her to help him in his new start, belief in the sincerity of his repentance, and the thought of her children having a legal guardian in case of her death, whereas, before they would have been left to strangers, all worked in his favor.

The notice of final proof to be made on Mrs. Ashley's homestead entry appeared in the next issue of the McCook Democrat, and the reunited couple began the new year together, at Akron, Colorado.—Frona W. Calvin, in Yankee Blade.

ANIMAL LANGUAGE.

Incontrovertible Evidence That Speech Is Not Limited to Man.

The intellectual superiority of civilized man over his savage brethren is due to the multiplicity of his objects of thought, and precisely so is it with the intellectual superiority of the savage man over his Simian ancestors. The actions of all have the same aim—viz., the supplying of the wants of physical nature and the gratifying of the desires aroused in the mind. The old theory that speech was altogether limited to the human race has now to be given up once and for all, for such a statement can not stand against the scientific evidence brought forward to oppose it from all quarters.

Language is but a product of reflection and experience, and originated, in all probability, in interjection or the instinctive expression of the subjective impressions, derived from external nature; and just as the reflective powers of the race were developed and shown more brilliantly as each stage in the evolutionary march of intellect was passed, so did language pass from the simple monosyllabic cries of the lower animals and savage men to the complex dialects of modern civilization; and it is worthy of note that at the present day, or at least very recently, there were races of savage men inhabiting the earth who possessed no proper language at all, and could not, on account of their manner of living, be placed on a higher intellectual level than the higher apes; while we have the authority of the leading philologists of the day in support of the fact that the monosyllabic cries of some of the lower human tribes are well within the grasp of the ape's voice.

Travelers whose veracity and ability can not be impugned have described long conferences held by monkeys where one individual addressed the assembly at great length, fixing the attention of all upon himself and quelling every disturbance by a loud and harsh cry, which was at once recognized and obeyed by the multitude; and we need no traveler to point out to us the many notes of call and recognition possessed by birds of all kinds, who thoroughly well understand each other's expressions, and, moreover, are able to produce quite a string of different notes consecutively, and without any hesitation. In fact, the organ of voice in some of the lower animals far exceeds in power that of some tribes of the human family.

The Euphonia musica of the East Indies can perform the seven notes in the scale; the chaffinch not only sings real songs, but invents them, one of his songs containing as many as five long strophes, while the songs of many savage races of men never run to half that length, and when Cook visited the Fiji archipelago the native women could only sing from la to mi. Asia appears to have been the birthplace of stringed instruments, no Southern tribes ever having been discovered using such musical appliances. We see, therefore, a gradual improvement taking place in vocal apparatus as we rise in the animal scale, which results in speech and song, and, indirectly, in instrumental music of various degrees; and we find fresh proof that there is as wide a difference between the development of civilized European and the savage man as between that of the savage man and his brute ancestry.—Gentleman's Magazine.

VORACIOUS REPTILES.

Naturalist Buckland Describes How a Python Takes His Dinner.

It is not every one who has seen a python take a meal. It is usually averse to dead food; but it is partial to a live rabbit, or a chicken, or a guinea-pig, or by preference a rat. The python seems to know that the rat will try to escape and he gives it no time or quarter. With a rapidity that can hardly be conceived he seizes the rat with his mouth and the fatal coil passes around the creature, squeezing all the life out of it and reducing the body to the form of an elongated sausage, which the snake lubricates with its own slime and swallows entire. If a fowl is put into a python's cage the snake sometimes seems to take no notice, and the frightened bird, finding that no harm comes to it, begins to ruffle its feathers and to peck about, occasionally trying its beak on the snake's skin. But after awhile the end of the python's tail may be seen to quiver with a strange emotion, whilst the small, black, beady eye is fixed upon the fowl. Suddenly there is a convulsion. The snake has moved and the fowl has disappeared, and can only be discovered by the end of a feather or two protruding from the coils in the python's neck which have crushed the bird's life out. In its natural state the python will catch a deer or a wild pig and crush it in the powerful coils of its neck. There is a well-authenticated story of a large python having caught two wild sucking pigs simultaneously, crushing both with the same coil of its neck. In the case of the python mentioned above, which was killed by the horns of the buck that it had swallowed, the snake must have been able to break all the bones of the body, but the stag's horns were probably too sharp and pointed to be easily crushed, and the snake rashly took the chance of digesting them in its stomach. No stories of a python killing a man ever came to my knowledge, but one of the keepers at the Calcutta Zoological Gardens had his arm much injured one morning by a python coiling itself on it and squeezing it severely before the man could be rescued.—Longman's Magazine.

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.

—Extracting oil from cedar boughs is a new industry in Maine.

—Steel, when hardened, decreases in specific gravity, contracts in length and increases in diameter.

—Rosewood shingles are being imported as a novelty for trimming showy cottages at seaside resorts.

—A New York hatter says that none of the so-called Panama hats are made at Panama. The best of them, he explains, comes from Guyaquil.

—A late refinement in dentistry is a tiny electric lamp for lighting up the cavities of teeth during the process of filling.

—Dealers in hard wood furnishings say that sycamore wood is rapidly coming into use. It "works" well, makes an excellent finish, and is much cheaper than birch, maple, or oak.

—A sugar refining company with $5,000,000 capital has been started to use Henry Friend's new method of refining by electricity. The cost will be about seventy-five cents a ton.

—A recent English invention relates to casting packing rings ready for use without boring or turning. The rings are cast in a chill mold around a metalic core.

—The introduction of American watches into England has reduced the number of gold cases marked at the London Assay Office from 34,844 in 1876 to 20,416 in 1886, and of silver cases from 119,394 in 1876 to 95,708 in 1886.

—The mystery regarding the whites of eggs after the ice-cream factories have used up their yelks is explained by a statement that they are used to make albumenized paper for photography.

—The question having arisen as to why the fallen branches of trees, at certain stages of decay, are more or less colored through their tissues with various shades of green, it is alleged that chemical analysis shows the presence of iron as the base of the green coloring matter.

—The smallest circular saw in use is one used in slitting gold pens. It is a disc about the size of a five-cent piece and has the thickness of ordinary paper. Its velocity tends to keep it rigid enough for use; four hundred revolutions a minute is the ordinary rate of these diminutive saws.

—The latest idea in the direction of waterproof footwear is a shoe made with a stout calfskin vamp, seamless, underlying which is a vamp of thin rubber, and between it and the lining, which is of stout canvas. The bottom of the shoes has a rubber interlining between the outer and inner soles, and thus the shoe is about as near waterproof as a leather shoe can be.

—Barrels are now being made of hard and soft wood, each alternate stave being of the soft variety and slightly thicker than the hard wood stave. The edges of the staves are cut square, and, when placed together to form the barrel, the outsides are even, and there is a V-shaped crack between each stave from top to bottom. In this arrangement the operation of driving the hoops forces the edges of the hard staves into the soft ones until the cracks are closed, and the extra thickness of the latter causes its inner edges to lap over those of the hard wood staves, thus making the joint doubly secure.

—In some recent scientific experiments on the effects of cold, two frogs were frozen solid in a temperature of about 20° F., and kept in that condition for half an hour. On thawing slowly they recovered perfectly, but it was found that large periods of exposure invraiably killed the animals. The experiment was tried of freezing hermetically sealed meat, so as to kill its bacterial organisms, and thus render it incapable of putrefying. It was found, however, that so low a temperature as 80° below zero would not destroy the vitality of micro-organisms. It was thus made clear that the attempts to preserve meat for a long time by a momentary freezing of it must be abandoned.

Weakness or debility of body, however produced. This can only be remedied by proper nutriment.
Work or study indoors, carried on in an unnatural or cramped position of body.

Literary men and women ought to do most of their work at a standing desk, lying down now and then to ease brain and heart and permit ideas to flow. They should work out of doors in fine weather—with their feet resting on a board, not on the earth—and under canvas in wet weather. It is surprising the good this simple advice, if followed, can effect.—Pioneer-Press.

Why Johnny Was Late.

A crabbed old bachelor who teaches school not far from Austin was very indignant at little Johnny Flapjack—the only son of Mrs. Flapjack, and she a widow—for coming late.

"I couldn't help being late," sobbed Johnny.

"Why not?"

"Because ma has done been and got married yesterday, and I had to wait for my breakfast."

"Got married, has she? Any thing to make you late at school. What won't she do next, I wonder?"—Texas Siftings.

PRESERVING THE HAIR.

Valuable Suggestions, Evidently Offered by a Married Man.

A young gentleman, whom we never suspected of vanity, but whose evident tendency to baldness we have often deplored, asks us how to preserve the hair. He requests that our reply be strictly confidential; but knowing the character of the postmistress in his town, we prefer to run no risks, and accordingly answer in cold type.

There are several well accredited methods of preserving the hair. Personally, we have tried none of them, but have kept a careful record of those recommended by our baldest friends. To avoid any invidious distinction between them we submit the several methods in alphabetical order:

A—Arrogate no authority in the household.
B—Be in every night as early as a shutter can be procured.
C—Carry up coal when requested.
D—Don't dictate.
E—Eat what is set before you.
F—Fix the fire before going to bed.
G—Govern with wisdom the dog.
H—Hold your tongue when addressed.
I—Incline to instant obedience.
J—Join nothing—except stovepipe.
K—Keep off the carpet.
L—Look sweet when lulling the baby.
M—Make merry with the wood pile.
N—Never look a new bonnet in the bill.
O—Ostracise yourself when the sewing circle meets.
P—Practice perfect patience.
Q—Quash every querulous complaint.
R—Render yourself scarce in house-cleaning time.
S—Spend and be spent for the Sisters of Timbuctoo and the House for Incurable Hottentots.
T—Tend door.
U—Upset nothing.
V—Vanish when callers come.
W—Watch the kerosene lamp and don't let it smoke.
X—Xplain when called upon.
Y—Yearn for mother-in-law.
Z—Zeus, remember, often and again gave in to Juno; and he had ambrosial locks—Burlington Free Press.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—Time is money in planting time, and an hour wasted may be an acre destroyed.

—Apple sauce is much improved by the addition of a tablespoonful of butter and requires less sugar.

—Good sleep and enough of it is a superior safeguard for health of men and women who overtask physical or mental energies.

—Broodiness can be hastened in a hen, according to one authority, by leaving eggs in the nest and giving a little hemp seed.

—Eight hours spent in work, and four hours spent in study, will afford better results in the agricultural world than twelve hours spent wholly in manual labor.—Western Plowman.

—The pork that bears the highest price in the English markets is that fattened by the people of Ireland, who feed a great variety of materials, but little or no corn.

—A good disinfectant is made by dissolving half a drachm of nitrate of lead in a pint of boiling water, then dissolve two drachms of common salt in eight or ten quarts of water.

—Sorrel is picked from the stems, washed well and drained, then put in an enameled saucepan or earthen crock with a piece of butter to steam in its own juice. A rich sauce of flour, butter, gravy and the yelks of two or three eggs is served with it, and it is a delicate dish with roast lamb. Asparagus is gently boiled ten to twenty minutes in salt water, drained and served with a sauce of two ounces of butter, a dessertspoonful of flour, the yelks of two eggs and part of the water in which the "grass" was boiled, which has the richest flavor of the plant.

—Egg Sauce for Spinach: Melt a tablespoonful of butter, add to it an even tablespoonful of flour, mix until smooth, and add a half-pint of boiling water; stir rapidly until the sauce is smooth and velvety, take from the fire, add a tablespoonful of butter cut into bits, a teaspoonful of lemon juice, a half teaspoonful of salt, and a dash of white pepper; mix until the butter is melted, and add the yelks of the eggs that have been pressed through a sieve. Bring the sauce to boiling point, pour it around the spinach and serve.

—Kalsomine: Eight pounds of whiting and one-quarter of a pound of white glue make the right proportions. Soak the glue over night in cold water, and in the morning heat it until it is perfectly dissolved. Mix the whiting with hot water, stir the two thoroughly together, and have the wash the consistence of thick cream. Apply warm with a kalsomine brush, brushing it well in and finishing it as you go on. If warm skim milk is used instead of water, the glue may be omitted. Before the wash is applied, all holes and crevices should be stopped with plaster of Paris mixed with water. Colors to tint the walls may be procured at any paint store.

CLEANING HARNESS.

A New Way Which Is Said to Be Superior to Old Methods.

Let me say to all having any thing to do with harness—keep out the lampblack. It never was intended to use on any kind of leather that is to be blacked on the grain side, but only on the flesh side, of such as is used for shoe leather, because when applied to the grain side it will rub off on your hands every time there is a damp spell or the leather gets wet. Nearly all country stores and harness shops keep for sale a preparation of neatsfoot of lampblack and other ingredients, for the purpose of oiling harness. I do not want any such on my harness. A better plan for cleaning, blacking and oiling your harness is this: First, take the harness apart wherever it can be unbuckled; give each strap a good washing, using lukewarm water with a little washing soda in it. Scrub them well with a scrubbing brush, and be sure you get all the grease and dirt off. Work them well in the hands until they are soft and pliant, for it is no use to apply oil on dry, horny leather; it will never become soft. After the harness is thoroughly cleansed with the soda water you will find places on some parts that will be a little red or foxy. To cover these rightly a little previous preparation must be made. Take a small keg or a half barrel and get some iron filings from a machine shop, or old rusted stovepipe, wornout horse-shoes—any kind of iron—put them in this keg and cover with cider vinegar. Always keep it on hand, for the longer it stands the stronger it will get. After a few weeks draw off some of this color and put a little copperas into it. Now you have a complete grain color; I know of none better. Take a brush and apply this liquid to parts on the harness that show red, or you can go all over them with it. This must be done immediately after you have washed your harness, before oiling, because it will not dry too rapidly, until about three parts dry, then apply pure cod oil plentifully on both sides—not neatsfoot oil, as has been recommended. The cod oil has more body and is more lasting than any other oil I have ever used on leather that has been tanned with bark. besides, if you use neatsfoot oil, the rats and mice will eat your harness, while that greased with cod oil they will not touch. After giving a good coat of this cod oil, hang up as before until dry. Then I would go over them again with the oil, giving them but a light coat of it this time. After that dries in, wipe off with a dry, coarse cloth. For common work harness nothing more is needed, but for carriage harness go over with a sponge and castile soap, and wipe with a dry chamois skin, and you may depend upon it there will be no black to rub off on your hands.—E. Chambers, in Boston Globe.

HUNTING HIPPOPOTAMI.

How the Young Are Caught by the Agents of Menagerie Proprietors.

"I have counted as many as twenty hippopotamus heads in one pool," said Mr. Lohse, "and the river is full of them. Of course, it would be impossible to catch the old ones, but they have to be got out of the way, and the only way to do is to shoot them. I have shot six in one pool in an afternoon. As soon as all the old ones are killed, the hunters—and they are very brave ones who go after hippopotami—harpoon the young through the neck. The neck is very thick and fat, and if the harpoon is skillfully thrown there is no danger of killing the young hippopotamus. A float is fastened to the harpoon by a rope, and when the animal becomes completely exhausted in its efforts to free itself it is drawn gently to the shore by this rope, and secured. It is put into a pen and kept there and fed upon goat's milk until its wound is healed, when it is driven to the seriffa.

"As I said, the hippopotamus hunters are very courageous and can swim and dive like seals. I lost one of my best men the last trip I made on a hippopotamus hunt. Early one morning we saw a young hippopotamus in the water near the opposite bank of the river. Before I could stop him, Elbibo, the chief of my hunters, was in the river and swimming rapidly across to harpoon the animal. He got close to it and had raised his arm to throw the harpoon when he suddenly gave a yell and sank out of sight. A ripple near where he had been told us that he had been dragged under by a crocodile. We had given him up as lost, when he reappeared and made his way to the bank, where he lay down exhausted. His left arm was torn off at the shoulder. I did what I could for the poor fellow but he bled to death that night. He never made a cry, but asked me quietly just before he died to see that his two wives did not suffer from poverty.

Mr. Lohse has also had exciting times hunting the rhinoceros. As with the elephants the young are run down by horsemen until they are exhausted. The baby rhinoceros is then lassoed to a tree until its spirit is broken sufficiently to permit of its being driven to the camp. As in hunting the other animals there is a particular class of trained men who go after the rhinoceros. They must be expert riders, and fully acqainted with the habits of the huge, dangerous beasts they attack.

"An infuriated rhinoceros," said Mr. Lohse, "is literally blind with rage." He puts his head down, and runs in a bee line, knocking down every thing in his way. If there was a stone wall in front of him he would smash right up against it. Some of my Homrahn hunters wounded a female rhinoceros one day, when the brute ran off. The men were securing her young when she suddenly stopped and rushed toward them. It was such an unheard-of thing for one of the animals to do, that the hunters were taken completely by surprise. One of them was caught by her horn and thrown high in the air. He dropped to the ground a corpse, for the rhinoceros had disemboweled him. —N. Y. Evening Sun.

HARD ON THE EYES.

Why Pittsburgh Iron Heaters Are Almost All Near Sighted.

It is a fact that a large percentage of the men employed as heaters in the iron mills of Pittsburgh are more or less troubled with defective vision, the nature of their work compelling them to gaze for protracted periods upon the intensely dazzling light of metal at white heat, which they must be able to distinguish from the flames of burning gas which surround it. Secretary William Martin, of the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers in Pittsburgh, says that among men who have worked for a few years in the iron mills near-sightedness or weakness of the eyes is almost universal, and advised the reporter to interview a few of the employes of any mill in the city to test this statement.

This was done, resulting in confirmation from half a dozen heaters in one of the largest rolling-mills in the city. The men seen had worked in the iron mills from periods ranging from three to twenty years, and with very slight differences their powers of vision had all been affected in the same manner. They are unable to distinguish small objects at any considerable distance. One was entirely unable to read the print in an ordinary newspaper; another pointed out a clock with a dial a foot in diameter and said he could not see the hands ten feet away. With one the trouble was permanent and unvarying, while another's eyes were restored to their normal condition if he stopped a month. None of them experience pain, and it does not seem to have occurred to any one that a physician's services were needed. They regard the change that takes place in their eyes as a sort of process of "getting used" to necessary requirements of their trade.

The reporter on looking into one of their blazing heaters could distingnish only a blinding glare, scarcely inferior to the dazzling light of the sun itself. Yet these men must be able to see clearly the white-hot masses of metal through the flames of the gas that is burning all around them. The difficulty of doing this may be compared to that which would be experienced in trying to perceive one bright light through another. Yet the experienced heater does it with as much ease as if the hot iron were so much wood floating in water. They say that no degree of proficiency can be acquired in less than three months' time, and that since the employment of natural gas in the furnaces the difficulty has become much greater and the effect upon the eye more pronounced.—Pittsburgh Letter.

Kosciusko's Devotion.

Kosciusko—Why, of course I do, Miss Esmeralda.

"Why, yes; lots."

"Wouldst thou make sacrifices for thy precious love?"

"Well, I should snicker. Out of love for you I'd even go and marry some other girl."—Texas Siftings.

It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar ailments.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.

As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system. For morning sickness, or nausea, from whatever cause arising, weak stomach, indigestion, dyspepsia and kindred symptoms, its use, in small doses, will prove very beneficial.

"Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhœa, excessive flowing, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at that critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The Change of Life."

"Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper and faithfully carried out for many years.

$10 REAL VALUE FREE!
Our new stamping outfit is free to every reader of this publication; it contains 100 perforated stamping patterns and includes a great variety of all sizes that are wanted. This outfit is a real work of art; no such stamping outfit has ever been offered heretofore, on which anything like so much artistic ability was brought to bear. With each outfit is a BOX of BEST STAMPING POWDER, PAD, AND BOOK of INSTRUCTIONS, giving full directions for stamping, tells how to make the powder and stamping paints, contains instructions for Lustre, Kensington and Hand painting, tells colors to use in painting—red, white, blue, yellow, pink and other flowers; also contains hints and instructions on other matters, too numerous to mention. Bought singly, or a few patterns at a time, at usual prices, the equal of the above would cost $10. Although it is free, yet this is the Regal Queen of Stamping Outfits and on every hand is acknowledged to be superior, yes, very much superior, and very much more desirable than those which have been selling for $1 each and upwards. By having 200,000 of these outfits made for us, during the dull season, we get them at first cost; the manufacturer was glad to take the order, at cost, that his help might be kept at work. All may depend that it is the very best, most artistic and in every way desirable outfit ever put before the public. Farm and Housekeeper (monthly, 16 large pages, 64 long columns, regular price 75 cents a year) is generally acknowledged to be the best general agricultural, housekeeping and family journal in America; it is entertaining and of great interest, as well as useful; its contributors embrace the widest range of brilliant talent. Furthermore, we have lately become managing owners of that grand monthly, Sunshine, for youth; also, for those of all ages whose beauties are not withered by 16 large pages, 64 long columns, regular price 75 cents a year. Sunshine is known favorably as the best youth's monthly in America. The best writers for youth, in the world, are its regular contributors; it is now quoted all over the world as standing at the head. Both papers are splendidly illustrated by the best artists. We will take 50,000 trial year subscribers at a price which gives us but a moderate portion of the cost.

FREE! Furthermore, every trial year subscriber, for either of the papers will receive free by mail our new 800 pattern Stamping Outfit. Trial year subscriptions will be received for either of the papers as follows: 1 subscription and 1 outfit, 35 cents; 2 subscriptions and 2 outfits, if sent at one time, 55 cents; 4 subscriptions and 4 outfits, if sent at one time, $1. For $1 and a dollar bill, but for less, send 1-cent postage stamps. Better at once get three friends to join you, all 25 cents each; you can do it in a few minutes and they will thank you; papers will be mailed regularly to their separate addresses. While trial year subscribers are served for much less than cost, it proves the rule that a very large proportion of all who read either paper for a year, want it thereafter, and are willing to pay the regular price of 75 cents a year; through this, as time rolls on, we reap a profit that satisfies us.

FREE! The trial year subscriptions are almost free, and this the Regal Queen of Stamping Outfits—the best ever known—is free. It is the greatest and best offer ever made to the public. Large sizes of patterns—every size that can be desired is included; all other outfits surpassed, by this, the best, the most artistic, the Regal Queen. Below we give a list of a few of the patterns; space is too valuable to admit of naming all: 1 Poppies for Scarf; 2 Lily design; 3 Tidy design; 4 Bird; 5 Splendid Tinsel design, 8 inch; 6 Golden Rod, 4 inch; 7 Pond Lilies; 8 Pansies; 9 Moss Rose Buds; 10 Tube Roses; 11 Wheat; 12 Oak Leaves; 13 Maiden Hair Fern; 14 Boy; 15 Girl's Head; 16 Bird; 17 Straw berries; 18 Owl; 19 Dog; 20 Butterfly; 21 Apple Blossoms; 22 Calla Lily; 23 Anchors; 24 Morning Glories; 25 Japanese Lilies; 26 Rabbit; 27 Rose Buds; 28 Forget-me-nots; 29 Fuchsias; 30 Bell Drops; 31 Fan; 32 Clown's Head; 33 Cat's Head. 70 other splendid patterns are included in the Regal Queen of stamping outfits—in all 100 patterns. Safe delivery guaranteed. Possessing this outfit any lady can, without expense, make home beautiful in many ways, can embroider childrens and ladies clothing in the most charming manner, and readily make money by doing stamping. Lustre, Kensington and Hand painting for others. A good stamping outfit is indispensable to every woman who cares to make home beautiful. This outfit contains patterns for each and every branch of needle work, flower painting, etc., and the Book of Instructions makes all clear and really easy. This outfit will do more for HOME and LADIES than many times the amount of a trial year subscription spent otherwise; no home should be with out it. The beautiful designs of this REGAL QUEEN OF OUTFITS ARE ALL THE RAGE wherever seen; when ever one or two reach a locality their fame spreads, and many TRIAL YEAR subscriptions usually follow. Many who have paid from $1 to $2 for outfits and were satisfied until they saw our designs, have secured our outfit and laid aside forever the others. Those who subscribe will find the papers well worth several times the trifling cost of a trial year subscription, and the majority will make up to us the loss, that this year we incur, through such a low price, by continuing subscribers, year after year, at the regular price, which all will be willing to admit is low enough. The money will gladly be refunded to any one who is not fully satisfied. Address,

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—Time is money in planting time, and an hour wasted may be an acre destroyed.

—Apple sauce is much improved by the addition of a tablespoonful of butter and requires less sugar.

—Good sleep and enough of it is a superior safeguard for health of men and women who overtask physical or mental energies.

—Broodiness can be hastened in a hen, according to one authority, by leaving eggs in the nest and giving a little hemp seed.

—Eight hours spent in work, and four hours spent in study, will afford better results in the agricultural world than twelve hours spent wholly in manual labor.—Western Plowman.

—The pork that bears the highest price in the English markets is that fattened by the people of Ireland, who feed a great variety of materials, but little or no corn.

—A good disinfectant is made by dissolving half a drachm of nitrate of lead in a pint of boiling water, then dissolve two drachms of common salt in eight or ten quarts of water.

—Sorrel is picked from the stems, washed well and drained, then put in an enameled saucepan or earthen crock with a piece of butter to steam in its own juice. A rich sauce of flour, butter, gravy and the yelks of two or three eggs is served with it, and it is a delicate dish with roast lamb. Asparagus is gently boiled ten to twenty minutes in salt water, drained and served with a sauce of two ounces of butter, a dessertspoonful of flour, the yelks of two eggs and part of the water in which the "grass" was boiled, which has the richest flavor of the plant.

—Egg Sauce for Spinach: Melt a tablespoonful of butter, add to it an even tablespoonful of flour, mix until smooth, and add a half-pint of boiling water; stir rapidly until the sauce is smooth and velvety, take from the fire, add a tablespoonful of butter cut into bits, a teaspoonful of lemon juice, a half teaspoonful of salt, and a dash of white pepper; mix until the butter is melted, and add the yelks of the eggs that have been pressed through a sieve. Bring the sauce to boiling point, pour it around the spinach and serve.

—Kalsomine: Eight pounds of whiting and one-quarter of a pound of white glue make the right proportions. Soak the glue over night in cold water, and in the morning heat it until it is perfectly dissolved. Mix the whiting with hot water, stir the two thoroughly together, and have the wash the consistence of thick cream. Apply warm with a kalsomine brush, brushing it well in and finishing it as you go on. If warm skim milk is used instead of water, the glue may be omitted. Before the wash is applied, all holes and crevices should be stopped with plaster of Paris mixed with water. Colors to tint the walls may be procured at any paint store.

CLEANING HARNESS.

A New Way Which Is Said to Be Superior to Old Methods.

Let me say to all having any thing to do with harness—keep out the lampblack. It never was intended to use on any kind of leather that is to be blacked on the grain side, but only on the flesh side, of such as is used for shoe leather, because when applied to the grain side it will rub off on your hands every time there is a damp spell or the leather gets wet. Nearly all country stores and harness shops keep for sale a preparation of neatsfoot of lampblack and other ingredients, for the purpose of oiling harness. I do not want any such on my harness. A better plan for cleaning, blacking and oiling your harness is this: First, take the harness apart wherever it can be unbuckled; give each strap a good washing, using lukewarm water with a little washing soda in it. Scrub them well with a scrubbing brush, and be sure you get all the grease and dirt off. Work them well in the hands until they are soft and pliant, for it is no use to apply oil on dry, horny leather; it will never become soft. After the harness is thoroughly cleansed with the soda water you will find places on some parts that will be a little red or foxy. To cover these rightly a little previous preparation must be made. Take a small keg or a half barrel and get some iron filings from a machine shop, or old rusted stovepipe, wornout horse-shoes—any kind of iron—put them in this keg and cover with cider vinegar. Always keep it on hand, for the longer it stands the stronger it will get. After a few weeks draw off some of this color and put a little copperas into it. Now you have a complete grain color; I know of none better. Take a brush and apply this liquid to parts on the harness that show red, or you can go all over them with it. This must be done immediately after you have washed your harness, before oiling, because it will not dry too rapidly, until about three parts dry, then apply pure cod oil plentifully on both sides—not neatsfoot oil, as has been recommended. The cod oil has more body and is more lasting than any other oil I have ever used on leather that has been tanned with bark. besides, if you use neatsfoot oil, the rats and mice will eat your harness, while that greased with cod oil they will not touch. After giving a good coat of this cod oil, hang up as before until dry. Then I would go over them again with the oil, giving them but a light coat of it this time. After that dries in, wipe off with a dry, coarse cloth. For common work harness nothing more is needed, but for carriage harness go over with a sponge and castile soap, and wipe with a dry chamois skin, and you may depend upon it there will be no black to rub off on your hands.—E. Chambers, in Boston Globe.

HUNTING HIPPOPOTAMI.

How the Young Are Caught by the Agents of Menagerie Proprietors.

"I have counted as many as twenty hippopotamus heads in one pool." said Mr. Lohse, "and the river is full of them. Of course, it would be impossible to catch the old ones, but they have to be got out of the way, and the only way to do is to shoot them. I have shot six in one pool in an afternoon. As soon as all the old ones are killed, the hunters—and they are very brave ones who go after hippopotami—harpoon the young through the neck. The neck is very thick and fat, and if the harpoon is skillfully thrown there is no danger of killing the young hippopotamus. A float is fastened to the harpoon by a rope, and when the animal becomes completely exhausted in its efforts to free itself it is drawn gently to the shore by this rope, and secured. It is put into a pen and kept there and fed upon goat's milk until its wound is healed, when it is driven to the seriffa.

"As I said, the hippopotamus hunters are very courageous and can swim and dive like seals. I lost one of my best men the last trip I made on a hippopotamus hunt. Early one morning we saw a young hippopotamus in the water near the opposite bank of the river. Before I could stop him, Elbibo, the chief of my hunters, was in the river and swimming rapidly across to harpoon the animal. He got close to it and had raised his arm to throw the harpoon when he suddenly gave a yell and sank out of sight. A ripple near where he had been told us that he had been dragged under by a crocodile. We had given him up as lost, when he reappeared and made his way to the bank, where he lay down exhausted. His left arm was torn off at the shoulder. I did what I could for the poor fellow but he bled to death that night. He never made a cry, but asked me quietly just before he died to see that his two wives did not suffer from poverty.

Mr. Lohse has also had exciting times hunting the rhinoceros. As with the elephants the young are run down by horsemen until they are exhausted. The baby rhinoceros is then lassoed to a tree until its spirit is broken sufficiently to permit of its being driven to the camp. As in hunting the other animals there is a particular class of trained men who go after the rhinoceros. They must be expert riders, and fully acqainted with the habits of the huge, dangerous beasts they attack.

"An infuriated rhinoceros," said Mr. Lohse, "is literally blind with rage." He puts his head down, and runs in a bee line, knocking down every thing in his way. If there was a stone wall in front of him he would smash right up against it. Some of my Homrahn hunters wounded a female rhinoceros one day, when the brute ran off. The men were securing her young when she suddenly stopped and rushed toward them. It was such an unheard-of thing for one of the animals to do, that the hunters were taken completely by surprise. One of them was caught by her horn and thrown high in the air. He dropped to the ground a corpse, for the rhinoceros had disemboweled him. —N. Y. Evening Sun.

HARD ON THE EYES.

Why Pittsburgh Iron Heaters Are Almost All Near Sighted.

It is a fact that a large percentage of the men employed as heaters in the iron mills of Pittsburgh are more or less troubled with defective vision, the nature of their work compelling them to gaze for protracted periods upon the intensely dazzling light of metal at white heat, which they must be able to distinguish from the flames of burning gas which surround it. Secretary William Martin, of the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers in Pittsburgh, says that among men who have worked for a few years in the iron mills near-sightedness or weakness of the eyes is almost universal, and advised the reporter to interview a few of the employes of any mill in the city to test this statement.

This was done, resulting in confirmation from half a dozen heaters in one of the largest rolling-mills in the city. The men seen had worked in the iron mills from periods ranging from three to twenty years, and with very slight differences their powers of vision had all been affected in the same manner. They are unable to distinguish small objects at any considerable distance. One was entirely unable to read the print in an ordinary newspaper; another pointed out a clock with a dial a foot in diameter and said he could not see the hands ten feet away. With one the trouble was permanent and unvarying, while another's eyes were restored to their normal condition if he stopped a month. None of them experience pain, and it does not seem to have occurred to any one that a physician's services were needed. They regard the change that takes place in their eyes as a sort of process of "getting used" to necessary requirements of their trade.

The reporter on looking into one of their blazing heaters could distinguish only a blinding glare, scarcely inferior to the dazzling light of the sun itself. Yet these men must be able to see clearly the white-hot masses of metal through the flames of the gas that is burning all around them. The difficulty of doing this may be compared to that which would be experienced in trying to perceive one bright light through another. Yet the experienced heater does it with as much ease as if the hot iron were so much wood floating in water. They say that no degree of proficiency can be acquired in less than three months' time, and that since the employment of natural gas in the furnaces the difficulty has become much greater and the effect upon the eye more pronounced.—Pittsburgh Letter.

Kosciusko's Devotion.

"Do you really love me, Kosciusko?" murmured Esmeralda Longcoffin.

Kosciusko—Why, of course I do, Miss Esmeralda.

"Much, deary?"

"Why, yes; lots."

"Wouldst thou make sacrifices for thy precious love?"

"Well, I should snicker. Out of love for you I'd even go and marry some other girl."—Texas Siftings.

A WALKING-STICK may be described as "the old man's strength and the young man's weakness," and an umbrella as "a fair and foul weather friend who has had many ups and downs in the world."

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.
Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar ailments.
As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages in particular. For overworked, worn-out, "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.
As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritation, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.
Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition, and a perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system. For morning sickness, or nausea, from whatever cause arising, weak stomach, indigestion, dyspepsia and kindred symptoms, its use, in small doses, will prove very beneficial.
"Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhea, excessive flowing, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."
As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at that critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The Change of Life."
"Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.
"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper and faithfully carried out for many years.

Our new stamping outfit is free to every reader of this publication; it contains 100 perforated stamping patterns and includes a great variety of all sizes that are wanted. This outfit is a real work of art; no stamping outfit has ever been offered heretofore, on which anything like so much artistic ability was brought to bear. With each outfit is a BOX OF BEST STAMPING POWDER, PAD, AND BOOK OF INSTRUCTIONS, giving full directions for stamping, tells how to make the powder and stamping paint, contains instructions for Lustre, Kensington and Hand painting, tells colors to use in painting—red, white, blue, yellow, pink and other flowers; also contains hints and instructions on other matters, too numerous to mention. Bought singly, or a few patterns at a time, at usual prices, the equal of the above would cost $10. All, though it is free, yet this is the Regal Queen of Stamping Outfits and on every hand is acknowledged to be superior, yes, very much superior, and very much more desirable than those which have been selling for $1 each and upwards. By having 200,000 of these outfits made for us, during the dull season, we get them at first cost; the manufacturer was glad to take the order, at cost, that his help might be kept at work. All may depend that it is the very best, most artistic and in every way desirable outfit ever put before the public. Farm and Housekeeper (monthly, 16 large pages, 64 long columns, regular price 25 cents a year) is generally acknowledged to be the best general agricultural, housekeeping and family journal in America; it is entertaining and of great interest, as well as useful; its contributors embrace the whole range of brilliant talent. Furthermore, we have lately become managing owners of that grand monthly, Sunshine, for youth; also, for those of all ages whose hearts are young, (monthly, 16 large pages, 64 long columns, regular price 75 cents a year. Sunshine is known favorably as the best youth's monthly in America. The best writers for youth, in the world, are its regular contributors; it is now quoted all over the world as standing at the head. Both papers are splendidly illustrated by the best artists. We will take 50,000 trial year subscribers at a price which gives us but a moderate portion of the cost.
FREE! Furthermore, every trial year subscriber, for either of the papers will receive free by mail our new 900 pattern Stamping Outfit. Trial year subscriptions will be received for either of the papers as follows: 1 subscription and 1 outfit, 25 cents; 2 subscriptions and 2 outfits, if sent at one time, 45 cents; 4 subscriptions and 4 outfits, if sent at one time, $1. For $1 send a dollar bill, but for less, send 1-cent postage stamps. Better at once get three friends to join you, at 25 cents each; you can do it in a few minutes and they will thank you; papers will be mailed regularly to their separate addresses. While trial year subscribers are served for much less than cost, it proves the rule that a very large proportion of all who read either paper for a year, want it thereafter, and are willing to pay the regular price of 75 cents a year; through this, as time rolls on, we reap a profit that satisfies us.
FREE! The trial year subscriptions are almost free, and this the Regal Queen of Stamping Outfits—the best ever known—is free. It is the greatest and best offer ever made to the public. Large sizes of patterns—every size that can be desired is included; all other outfits surpassed, by this, the best, the most artistic, the Regal Queen. Below we give a list of a few of the patterns; space is too valuable to admit of naming all: 1 Poppies for Scarf, 7-12 inch; 2 Fifty designs, 7-12 inch; 3 Splendid Tinsel design, 8 inch; 4 Golden Rod, 4 inch; 5 Pond Lilies; 6 Pansies; 7 Moss Rose Buds; 8 Tube Roses; 9 Wheat; 10 Oak Leaves; 11 Maiden Hair Ferns; 12 Boy; 13 Girl's Head; 14 Bird; 15 Strawberries; 16 Owl; 17 Dog; 18 Butterfly; 19 Apple Blossoms; 20 Calla Lily; 21 Anchors; 22 Morning Glories; 23 Japanese Lilies; 24 Rabbit; 25 Birch Bark; 26 Primrose-note; 26 Primrose; 27 Bell Drops; 28 Fan; 29 Clown's Head; 30 Cat's Head. 70 other splendid patterns are included in the Regal Queen of stamping outfits—in all 100 patterns. Safe delivery guaranteed. Possessing this outfit any lady can, without expense, make home beautiful in many ways, can embroider childrens' and ladies' clothing in the most charming manner, and readily make money by doing stamping, Lustre, Kensington and Hand painting for others. A good stamping outfit is indispensable to every woman who cares to make home beautiful. This outfit contains patterns for each and every branch of needle work, flower painting, etc., and the Book of Instructions makes all clear and really easy. This outfit will do more for HOME and LADIES than many times the amount of a trial year subscription spent otherwise; no home should be with out it. The beautiful designs of this Regal Queen of outfits ARE ALL THE RAGE wherever seen; when ever one or two reach a locality their fame spreads, and many TRIAL YEAR subscriptions usually follow. Many who have paid from $1 to $2 for outfits and were satisfied until they saw our designs, have secured our outfit and laid aside forever the others. Those who subscribe will find the papers well worth several times the trifling cost of a trial year subscription, and the majority will make up to us the loss, that this year we incur, through such a low price, by continuing subscribers a year after year, at the regular price, which all will be willing to admit is low enough. The money will gladly be refunded to any one who is not fully satisfied. Address,

SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1888.

Here is but one of many indications of what the passage of the Mills bill will do. Fearing that it will become a law, the Roottknit goods manufacturing company, of Cohoes, New York, has sent an agent to Germany with a view to purchasing a site for a mill in that country and removing their business there, as it would be impracticable to continue in business here. The company employs 500 persons, with a monthly pay roll of $18,000.

They Like the Mills Bill.

An American business man who has spent several months abroad, recently wrote from Brandfoad, England, to a well-known Philadelphia broker as follows:

"Business here and elsewhere is very poor. Manufacturers and merchants both complain of the volume being done and the meagre profits they obtain.

"Almost anyone you meet in trade circles questions you regarding the prospects of our Tariff bill and seems to think it is the one ray of hope they have of an improved condition of matters. Several of the largest manufacturers in this district (Yorkshire) have discussed with me the idea of their removing their plants to the States in the event of the tariff not being reduced to a considerable extent. I discussed this same question with them two years ago, but at that time they would not entertain the thought. Should Congress rectify the worsted clause and make them pay the same duty on woolens it would make matters much worse for the people here.

Blaine Will Not Accept.

NEW YORK, May 30.—The Tribune of to-day publishes the following letter from Mr. Blaine:

PARIS, May 17, 1888.

Whitelaw Reid, Esq., Editor New York Tribune:

MY DEAR SIR:—Since my return to Paris from southern Italy, on the 8th instant, I have learned (what I did not before believe) that my name may yet be presented to the National Convention as a candidate for the Presidential nomination by the Republican party. A single phrase of my letter of February 25, from Florence (which was decisive of everything I had the personal power to decide,) has been treated by many of my most valued friends as not absolutely conclusive in ultimate and possible contingencies. On the other hand, friends equally devoted and disinterested have construed my letter, (as it should be construed), to be an unconditional withholding of my name from the National Convention. They have in consequence given their support to eminent gentlemen, who are candidates for the Chicago nomination, some of which would not, I am sure, have consented to assume that position, if I had desired to represent the party in the Presidential contest of 1888.

If I should now, by speech or by silence, by commission or omission, permit my name, in any event to come before the convention I should incur the reproach of being uncandid with those who have always been candid with me. I speak, therefore, because I am not willing to remain in a doubtful attitude. I am not willing to be the cause of misleading a single man among the millions who have given me their suffrages and their confidence. I am not willing that even one of my faithful supporters in the past should think me capable of pattering in a double sense with my words. Assuming that the Presidential nomination could by any possible chance be offered to me, I could not accept it without leaving in the minds of thousands of those men the impression that I had not been free from indiscretion, and therefore could not accept at all. The misrepresentations of malice have no weight but the just displeasure of friends I could not patiently endure.

Republican victory, the prospects of which grow brighter every day, can be imperilled only by lack of unity in council or acrimonious contest over men. This issue of protection is incalculably stronger and greater than any man, for it concerns the prosperity of the present and of generations to come.

Were it possible for every voter of the Republic to see for himself the condition and recompense of labor in Europe the party of free trade in the United States would not receive the support of one wage worker between the two oceans. It may not be directly in our power as philanthropists to elevate the European laborer, but it will be a lasting stigma upon our statesmanship if we permit the American laborer to be forced down to the European level. And in the end the rewards of labor everywhere will be advanced if we steadily refuse to lower the standard at home.

Yours very sincerely,
JAMES G. BLAINE.

Why Grant Was a Republican.

General Grant's Speech Delivered at Warren, O., Sept. 28, 1880.

It may be proper for me to account to you, on the first occasion of my presiding at a political meeting, for the faith that is in me.

I am a Republican as the two great political parties are now divided, because the Republican party is a national party, seeking the greatest good for the greatest number of citizens. There is not a precinct in this vast nation where a Democrat cannot cast his ballot, and have it counted as cast. No matter what the prominence of the opposite party, he can proclaim his political opinions, even if he is only one among a thousand, without fear and without persecution on account of his opinions. There are fourteen states, and localities in some other states, where Republicans have not this privilege. This is one reason why I am a Republican.

But I am a Republican for many other reasons. The Republican party assures protection to life and property; the public credit and the payment of the debts of the government—state, county and municipal—as far as it can control. The Democratic party does not promise this. If it does it has broken its promises to the extent of hundreds of millions, as many Northern Democrats can testify to their sorrow.

I am a Republican, as between the existing parties because it fosters the production of field and farm, and of manufactories, and it encourages the general education of the poor as well as the rich. The Democratic party discourages all these when in absolute power.

The Republican party is a party of progress and of liberality towards its opponents. It encourages the poor to strive to better their children, to enable them to compete successfully with their more fortunate associates; and, in fine, it secures an entire equality before the law of every citizen, no matter what his race, nationality or previous condition. It tolerates no privileged class. Every one has the opportunity to make himself all he is capable of.

It is a Free Trade Bill.

The Democratic newspapers, following the lead of the Democratic administration, insist upon it that the Mills bill is not a free trade measure, because it lowers the rates of duty very slightly. We regret to see that our esteemed contemporary, the World, continues to denounce Republican newspapers that call the Democrats free traders and their bill a free trade bill. As a matter of fact, no one cares whether the reductions effected by the Millrs bill are more or less. One of the worst features of the bill is that, while its authors pretend that it is made to reduce the surplus, its main object is to make an issue for the coming Presidential campaign. An appropriate title would be "A bill to change the revenue system of the United States." No one would care to contend against the slight reductions that are made by the bill if they were made with the protective principle in view. But the bill is made on a free trade principle. Certain articles are selected aud the duties upon them are entirely abolished, for the alleged purpose of giving our manufacturers an opportunity to compete with the foreigners in the markets of the world. This involves the admission of the foreigners into our own markets, as a matter of course, and the result must be to put an end to American control of the American market, which is the central idea of the protective system. The free traders know what they are after and what will be the ultimate result of the adoption of the Mills bill, and the protectionists are not at all deceived by the statements that the bill is only a slight reduction of rates, That is not a fair and frank statement of the case. On the contrary, it ts somewhat in the nature of a trick, and we are sorry to see so bold and honorable a champion of its opinions as the World is, adopting the little methods of people who are unwilling to engage in a fair fight on the issue of free trade or protection. The tariff will never be surreptitiously revised. They who suppose that it can be, underate the intelligence of the country. The struggle has now gone so far that the strongest ground that the Democrats can take is the honest one in favor of free trade. They will be beaten in it, but their defeat will not be so overwhelming, at least not so inglorious, as it would be if they were to go into the contest insisting that they only want to reduce duties a trifle.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, May 28th, 1888.—There is a prospect of another deadlock in the House at an early date, unless the Democrats join the Republicans in passing the bill removing the limitation from the arrearage of pensions act, and if they join in passing that measure, they thereby remove all necessity for a tariff bill, for there will then be no surplus to reduce, and that of course is the only possible excuse for such a bill as the Mills tariff bill. Already the committee on rules have been requested to report a resolution designating a time to consider the arrears of pensions bill, and they are in a quandary as to what to do in the matter. On Saturday the Republican members of the House in caucus assembled unanimously passed a resolution declaring it to be the sense of the Republicans of the House that the committee on rules be instructed to report a resolution assigning days for the consideration of all general pension bills, and that the order be made a continuing order, until all this class of business is disposed of. If the committee on rules, a majority of which are Democrats, refuse to report this resolution, there are a large number of Republicans who have expressed their intention of filibustering against the Mills tariff bill. That's the way the thing stands at writing.

Mr. Daniel Grosvenor, a member of the G. A. R. appointment committee, whose duty it is to look after the welfare of the old soldiers employed by the Government, gave his testimony before the House printing committee, which is engaged in investigating the Government printing office, on Saturday, in regard to the very unjust treatment the soldiers had received from Mr. Benedict, the Democratic Public Printer.

Gen. Sheridan has been very near death's door for the past six days. During that time he has had three distinct attacks, each of which it was feared would terminate fatally. For six days a doctor has been constantly at his side as he sat propped up in a reclining chair, it being impossible for him to lie down without danger of immediate death. He is suffering from what is known as valvular disease of the heart, one of the most uncertain and baffling diseases known to the medical faculty; one that is liable to kill without the slightest warning. His aged mother from Ohio arrived in the city Saturday night, and is now at the bedside of her son. The general fully realizes his very critical condition; on Friday he made his will. He is now somewhat better, though the danger is by no means considered past. In this case, as in many others of prominent people of late years, it was attempted to keep the public from knowing the real condition of the patient; the public was informed that the general was only suffering from a little fatigue, &c. This was kept up for three days before it became generally known that he was seriously ill.

The Republican caucus Saturday passed a resolution in favor of the Blair educational bill, but as the Democrats of the House committee on education, in whose hands it has been for months, refuse to meet and consider it, I don't see how it can get before the House.

The Democratic Senators are solidly against discussing the fisheries treaty in open session, but it will be done nevertheless, and afterwards it will be duly rejected.

Last week might fairly be considered an industrial one in both Houses of Congress. The House passed several of the regular appropriation bills and the Senate followed suite. The bill establishing a department of labor was passed, and that raising the Commissioner of Agriculture to a Cabinet position was passed by the House, and favorably reported to the Senate. Besides all this, the Senate had quite a number of secret sessions, nearly all devoted to settling whether the fisheries shall be discussed in public.

The President has approved the act limiting the hours of labor for letter carriers to eight per day.

No paper fractional currency will be issued. The bill having been adversely reported by the Senate nance committee. The committee reported in favor of a bill reducing the fee of postal notes of less than one dollar to one cent, believing that this would answer the purpose for which it was proposed to issue the fractional currency, and at the same time it will be much cheaper.

The cornerstone of the new Catholic university in this city was laid with very impressive ceremonies on Thursday. Among those in attendance were Cardinal Gibbons, the President and cabinet, about thirty bishops, over two hundred priests, and some thousands of laymen.

Sheridan's Longest Speech.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, May 27.—The longest speech ever delivered by General Sheridan will be printed tomorrow in the Times, giving it, so far as kown, the first publication other than a merely local one. The speech was made at the Creston reunion of the veterans of Southwest Iowa and Northwest Missouri. There were at least ten thousand veterans present, in addition to thousands of other persons. The enthusiasm for Sheridan was overwhelming, and, contrary to custom, he at last yielded to the importunities of the veterans and made a speech that went direct to every old soldier's heart. It was wholly impromtu and characteristic. Fortunately a first-class stenographer was present and took down verbatim as follows the words of "Little Phil:" "Comrades, I came here to-day to see you, and talk with you, and shake hands with you, while Colonel Carr and others, you know, came here to make eloquent addresses for you to listen to. I think he has been eulogistic of me in his remarks. It is true that I fought in almost everybody's way from Pea Ridge to Appomattox, and although I fought with cavalry and infantry and on every line of operation, and always had to change and take new men on new lines, I was very successful. I went through all the grades they had in the volunteer service, and then I commenced and went through all the grades in the regular service, and the date of every commission that I have is the date of a battle. Now, I want to say to you, comrades, I am indebted to the privates in the ranks for all this credit that has come to me. [Applause, long and continued.] He was the man who did the fighting, and the man who carried the musket is the greatest hero of the war, in my opinion. I was nothing but an agent. I knew how to take care of men. I knew what a soldier was worth, and I knew how to study the country so as to put him in right. I knew how to put him in battle when one occurred, but I was simply the agent to take care of him and he did the work. Now comrades, these are common-sense things, and I can't say them in very flowery language, but they are true, nevertheless; and they are true not of me alone, but of everybody else. It is to the common soldier that we are indebted to any credit to us. Now I am glad to see you here to-day, gentlemen, and I am glad to be with you on this occasion. There are many men here to-day who served in the field with me, and it is a great pleasure to me to find them out, and they have been very kindly in their remarks to me. While they were with me I certainly did all I could for them. I often lay awake planing for their welfare, and I never killed a man unnecessarily. One great trouble with men who command troops is that they kill men unnecessarily. You may kill as many men as you choose if you give them an equivalent for the loss. Men do not like to be killed for nothing; they do not like to have their heads rammed against a stone wall unless for some good results. These are the points I made during the war. Whenever I took men into a battle I gave them victory as the result of the engagement, and that was always satisfactory."

True Patriotism.

NEW ORLEANS, May 26.—General Gibson, re-elected United States Senator, was invited to address the legislature, and he did so. In the course of his remarks he said: "There never was a people, who, by the heat of a tremendous civil conflict, were so fused together as the people of the United States. It is true that here and there is to be found a man—a camp follower during the war, perhaps, or a demagogue—some man brave in bravado, some man who never wore a uniform or carried a musket, who would make you believe that the northern men were bent on humiliating the people of the south and that they distrust and despise them. Fellow citizens, this is not true. The people of the Northern States, in my judgment, are anxious and willing to recognize the people of the South as their fellow countrymen. I believe they are proud to do it. Fellow citizens, this is our Union, our constitution, and if I could do anything in my public career to bring the hearts and sympathies of the southern people to cherish the Union and the constitution I would feel that my task had not been in vain. It is true that the constitution has been changed, and that slavery has been abolished in the organic law of the land. It is true, fellow citizens, that the principles of secession have been eliminated from this structure of the Federal constitution. I think the wisest and best thing is for the southern people to make up their minds that they will accept in good faith the amendments to the constitution of the United States, which we have all sworn to support. How could we as men of honor do otherwise? There is the alternative of revolution. What would you think of the descendants of the men who followed the fortunes of the house of Stuart in England if they refused allegiance today to the house of Hanover and the British queen? What would you think of the Germans who, after the consolidation of the empire by the genius of Bismarck, were to disavow their allegiance and take up arms against the German government? Or what would be thought of a countryman of Cavour, whose genius united all Italy, if now he should take up arms against the Italian government? So the men who stood by the Confederacy, who risked their lives and fortunes for that cause, may now be true and loyal to the constitution of the United States and its amendments, and to the fortunes of the Union, whether they shall be good or evil."

Tinkering the Tariff in Caucus.

The Democratic party set out to devise a tariff that should raise no more revenue than is required by "the wants of the Government economically administered." They were going to hew right down to the revenue point, on the strict and straight line of "revenue reform."

When they got to work they dealt gently with sugar and rice, for both of these commodities, though highly protected, represent Democratic votes and Democratic votes had to be had. So it went on, until, in one way and another, a bill of most striking inconsistency with itself and with the professions of the Democratic party was prepared. Then it was held up to the admiring gaze of rock-ribbed Democrats, who declared it to be the "one thing altogether lovely."

Now that the bill has been done over in the Democratic caucus the faithful are expected to say once more that the bill is just as perfect as ever—quite as perfect as it was before the Democratic caucus pulled it seven ways from Sunday. They have knocked out the readjusted duty on soft steel made at the urgent request of the steel men of Wheeling and of others similarly situated; they took off and put on the free list according to demand backed by threats. The only principle held in view was the principle of getting votes for the bill in some shape.

The industries of the country and every interest dependent upon them are completely at the mercy of the necessities of the Democratic party, which must pass a tariff bill of some sort or go to the wall. It will go to the wall any how if the people of the United States have any regard for their bread and butter.—Wheeling Intelligencer.

The Condition of Trade.

NEW YORK, May 25.—R. G. Dun & C., in their review of trade say:

Gold has begun to go abroad in large amounts, $5,850,000 having been shipped since May 8. In the present state of foreign trade, suspension of foreign investments in this country involves exports of gold to meet current balances, whether any part of the foreign capital previously invested here is called back or not; but there are indications of foreign realizing in some securities.

The go out of gold, in view of the large accumulation of idle money, causes no apprehension. At interior points money is scarcely anywhere close, and at nearly all points easier, but complaints of slow collections do not diminish. The volume of trade is almost universally unsatisfactory, but the unfavarable weather is in most cases accepted as the chief cause, and some improvement is reported at Cleveland and Memphis.

The tendency of prices has been downward, both for securities and for products. The average for products was temporarily lifted by the speculaton in grain, but has fallen again to a point of five per cent below the highest for the year. Wheat has declined three cents with more favorable crop prospects. Corn has fallen two and one half cents for the week and oats one cent. Hogs and lard have advanced fifteen cents on the 100 pounds, and coffee half a cent, but cotton and sugar do not gain, and lard is three and one-half cents lower than a week ago. The decline in wool since May 1 has averaged thirty sents per 100 pounds. Hides continue very dull and leather generally favors buyers. There is no special activity seen in the boot and shoe trade, orders falling below expectations. Iron is very irregular. Definite, though not great improvement, appears in the dry goods and grocery trades.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, That section ten of chapter two hundred and one, of the acts of eighteen hundred and eighty-six, entitled "An act to incorporate the town of Deer Park, Garrett county," be and the same is hereby repealed and re-enacted to read as follows:

SECTION 10. And be it enacted, That the Mayor and Common Council may provide by ordinance to preserve the health of the town; to prevent and remove nuisances; to prevent, restrain, and regulate the running at large of horses, cattle, swine and geese, within the limits of said town; to prohibit and disperse the tumultuous or disorderly meetings of idle, dissolute or drunken persons; to provide for working and mending the public streets and alleys of said town; to provide for the making and repairing of sidewalks and gutters; and generally to provide for the regulation, good government and improvement of said town, and may enforce the observance thereof under such penalties, fines and forfeitures as they shall deem proper, not exceeding ten dollars for any one offense; and all fines, penalties and forfeitures may be recovered before a Justice of the Peace by warrant and judgment, and in case of failure or refusal to pay the same, the party so fined shall be committed for a period not exceeding ten days, to the Jail of Garrett county, in the same manner that commitments are made for fines imposed by the Circuit Courts of this State on conviction of misdemeanor, provided that all the expenses of such commitment and imprisonment shall be paid by the Mayor and Common Council of Deer Park; but said Mayor and Common Council, or a majority of them, shall have power at all times to remit or release the fines, penalties and forfeitures or any part thereof, at their discretion; but any party fined, or subject to any fine or forfeiture, may within five days after the same shall be imposed and judgment recovered, supersede and stay the same for thirty days, by giving ample personal security to the Justice of the Peace, and the fines and forfeitures imposed and collected by any of the provisions of this act may be paid by the Mayor and Common Council to the Bailiff as compensation for his services, or the said Mayor and Common Council may make such other disposition of said fines and forfeitures as they may deem best.

SUB-SECTION 1. And be it enacted, That the Mayor and Common Council shall have power to provide by ordinance for the laying out, opening, widening, straightening, extending or closing of any street, alley or lane in said town, or of any proposed street, alley or lane in said town, which in their judgment the public welfare or convenience may require, to provide for ascertaining whether any and what amount in value in damage will be caused thereby, for which the owner or possessor of any property through which said street, alley or lane may pass ought to be compensated, by the appointment of commissioners, the number of whom to be determined by said Mayor and Common Council, to assess the same; to provide for assessing and levying either, generally or the whole assessable property within the town, or specially on the property of persons benefited, the whole or any part of the damages and expenses which will be incured in laying out, opening, widening, straightening, extending or closing of any street, alley, or lane, or grading the same, to provide for collecting and paying the compensation awarded to any person before any street shall be opened, laid out, widened, straightened, extended, or closed, and to enact all ordinances from time to time necessary or proper to the exercises of the powers granted in this section; provided that before they shall proceed to execute any of the powers vested in them by this section, at least thirty days notice shall be given of any application which may be made for the passage of any such ordinance by advertisement in two newspapers printed in Garrett county; and provided further that upon the return of any assessment of damages or benefits or both, made under any ordinance passed under this section, the clerk of said town shall cause a copy thereof to be published once a week, for four successive weeks, in at least two newspapers printed in said county; and provided further that whenever the said Mayor and Common Council open, lay out, widen or extend any street, lane, or alley, they shall establish the grade thereof, and if in their judgment proper so to do, they shall grade the same.

SUB-SECTION 2. And be it enacted, That if any person shall feel aggrieved by the decision of the commissioners appointed to lay out such streets, alleys, or lanes, as to the amount of damages allowed him or benefits assessed against him, may appeal therefrom at any time within thirty days after said commissioners shall have made their return to the Circuit Court for Garrett county, which said appeal shall be taken by filing written notice thereof with the clerk of said Common Council, who shall thereupon without unnecessary delay, transmit to said Circuit Court a record of the proceedings of said Mayor and Common Council, and of said street commissioners in said matter, and said appeal shall be docketed upon the trial docket of the next succeeding term of said court, the party taking said appeal to be docketed as plaintiff, and said Mayor and Common Council as defendant, and said party appellant shall thereupon be entitled to a jury trial to assess the amount of damages payable to, or amount of benefits chargable against him as the case may be, and the amount assessed as such damages or benefits by said jury shall stand in the place and stead of the assessment thereof by said commissioners, and upon said appeal it shall be competent for the Court to quash the proceedings upon the motion of the appellant, for errors or omissions rendering the same fatally defective; and upon the trial of said cause in said Circuit Court either party may take bills of exception to any rulings of said Court upon matters of law arising in the progress of such trial, and either party appeal to the Court of Appeals of this State from any such ruling, or from the action of said court in quashing or refusing to quash such proceedings.

SEC. 2. And be it enacted, That this Act shall take effect from the date of its passage.

Approved February 3d, 1888.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a correct copy of An Act of the General Assembly of Maryland, passed January Session, 1888.

The "Twenty-Third" at Swanton.

Down came the rain. All day—no cessation. Not heavily, but with a quiet determination to fully enjoy its steady fall, fall. No heed paid it to the anxious wishes of "all the world"—around Swanton. What should we do? Miss the Band, the "Peak Sisters," the "Sunflower Chorus," the "Jacob's Well," the rare confectionery made expressly for us, beside the ice cream and fruit, all because "Old Probs" insisted upon being there too. Very good taste I admit, but we wouldn't allow the old fellow to have all the good things for himself. These sturdy dwellers of the mountains said him "nay," and though he pelted us right soundly, on we came until the beautifully decorated hall was well filled with an audience of representative persons. Now what did we find? Just such an entertainment as the genius and taste of the lady managers had led us to expect. No similar effort I believe has received such unanimous approval. Perhaps the most pleasing feature of it all arose from the fact that while those immediately interested number not more than half a dozen, the several denominations in the neighborhood gave their unqualified support. Where committees stand together on such a broad basis they will not long lack the graces of Christian charity, of which the world stands so much in need. May these people stand ever thus in whatever is right. The main feature of the evening was a serio-comic representation entitled "Peake Sisters," which has already made a national reputation. The "seven sisters" and "four brothers" reaching Swanton are to be complimented upon the piquant manner in which they recalled to us the almost forgotten but very dear Mother Goose Rhymes. Concluding as they did with the old but ever new "Three Blind Mice," none could fail of a hearty laugh, that, taking us back for a moment to our childhood days, made us all young again. Continuing their journeyings may the "Peake Sisters" make merry the hearts of all who listen to them. I have since heard that ten applications have been made for the paraphanalia of the Sunflower Chorus. The make-up of this, however, is supposed to be a profound secret—it can only be seen to be appreciated. Success to the gloriously faithful old flower, where ever he goes, with his heart full of song. Too much cannot be said of the Band from Oakland, who came through drizzling rain fourteen miles to keep an engagement. A set of men possessing the quality necessary to do this must be made of such material that will always win the respect and confidence of right thinking people. The music was very highly appreciated, and to the Band should be accorded half the honors of the evening.

Were this not a pen and ink talk, and I not taking up space in your already well-filled columns, very much could be said of the tasteful stage, the romantic Jacob's Well and the prettily decorated confectionery table, loaded with good things—so good indeed, that not a single orange or bit of fruit or confection remained unappropriated. May the ladies in the near future provide just such another treat for us. And if "Old Probs." can be induced to stay at home with his rain clouds I am sure Mr. West will have to enlarge the dimentions of his already commodious hall, or many of us will gather up only crambs of sound out on the platform, and miss entirely the pretty sights upstairs.

A FORTUNATE ONE.

ST. LOUIS, 1887.

I desire to express to you my hearty thanks for putting up the "Home Comfort" Range in my house. You could not take it away—if I could not get another of the same pattern—if you would pay me double the price you ask for it. It fills the bill exactly. The women folks are charmed with it. It bakes admirably, and is just the thing we were so badly in need of. No woman can be happy if deprived of the "Home Comfort" after having once used it. In designing the "Home Comfort" Range, you have conferred a great blessing upon the "women folks," and have done much to make home folks happy.

Yours truly,
NORMAN J. COLMAN,
Now U. S. Commissioner of Agriculture.

GENTLEMEN,—The "Home Comfort" Range now in use in our home is superior to any we have ever used. I most respectfully tender this evidence of its merits.

Very respectfully,
MRS. W. T. SHERMAN.

We sell more ranges in the city of St. Louis than ALL OTHERS COMBINED. This is extremely satisfactory to us, and should be a guarantee to strangers, that in buying a "HOME COMFORT" Range they run no risk. The FINEST GRADE OF MALLEABLE IRON, in connection with the best soft steel plates, handled and put together by the best steel and iron workers money can control, is the reason our Ranges are uniformly successful, besides our experience of over twenty years has been utilized to bring to its present state of perfection the

"HOME COMFORT" RANGE.

Mr. Jos. Powell, of Sulphur P. O., Trimble county, Ky., writes: "We have been keeping house twenty years, and have used up four cast iron stoves. We have now a 'Home Comfort' Range, and my wife pronounces it the most perfect, economical and in every way most satisfactory cooking apparatus she has ever had occasion to use."

KEEPING STEP TOGETHER.

The band was playing martial airs,
Their melodies repeating
In rhythmic rhyme; and, marking time,
The drums were loudly beating;
And those in uniform so fine,
With soldier cap and feather,
And others there along the square
Were keeping step together.

Beside me walked a maiden fair
Whose heart I had been seeking
For many a day, but had not found
The courage yet for speaking:
And as I watched her glowing face
I really wondered whether,
As man and wife, throughout our life,
We could keep step together.

The tune was changed; but still the band
Kept up its martial measure;
In unison the crowd moved on
To business, or to pleasure;
And she—emboldened by the scene,
Or by the bracing weather—
Exclaimed: "Just see how nicely we Are keeping step together!"

Ah! quickly I improved the time,
My heart a quickstep beating,
And soon the old, old story I
Was tenderly repeating;
And when the "Wedding March" was played,
Close bound by Hymen's tether,
Adown the aisle, with rapturous smile,
We two kept step together.

The years have sped; and we are old,
Who once were young and sprightly;
But still within our hearts the flame
Of love is burning brightly;
And though we've met with cloudy days,
And some tempestuous weather,
True comrades still—through good or ill—
We're keeping step together.

A WOULD-BE SOLDIER.

"Poleon Bonyparte" Has His Fortune Told.

"Yes, Sis Dinah, dey says as how dem gypsies camped down at Holly Springs knows ebrything in de world; how long you gwine ter lib, how much money you gwine ter make, and who yer gwine ter marry ef you is single. Why, Sis Mary Jemimy Lee, she pintedly told me how dey 'scribed her fust husband eben ter de wart on his nose, till she could most see him, and she nebber said a mortal word 'bout him ter one ob 'em. I'se clean feared to go and see dem."

Mrs. Cleopatra Allen, a credulous old negress, two shades darker than her namesake of the Nile, had dropped in for a pleasant gossip with her neighbor, Mrs. Dinah Maria Mullins.

An encampment of gypsies at Holly Springs, about a mile distant from the Turkey Creek settlement, had thrown the colored folks into the wildest confusion. Nothing was heard but their wonderful prophecies and fortune-telling, and though the wisest and most experienced of the men tried to prevent their women folks from frequenting the gypsy encampment, many a dollar crossed the hard palms of the deceptive old crones.

"Well, I dunno, Sis Cleopatry," Mrs. Dinah answered, deliberately. She was a stout, stolid-looking black woman, slow of speech and slow of comprehension. "I dunno as how you ought ter go. Jacob he says as how they're 'Gyptians and witches, and cast-offs from de Lord, and dat it don't become church members to 'sociate wid sech heathens. I'm powerful curus, I must say, ter know ef dey kin tell me who tuck my brass kettle wot wos stole last summer outer de yard. P'raps I'll send Poleon Bonyparte ter axe 'em."

"Maybe dey kin tell ef I'se gwine ter be a sojer, mammy!" Napoleon Bonaparte cried.

Napoleon, being very short and stout, with a small head which only held a thimbleful of sense, had decided that regimentals would exactly suit his style. He believed that with a gun and sword and fierce mustache, a few straggling hairs of which he was at that time nursing, he would be a terror to the boys of his own age at Turkey Creek, and a hero to its dusky damsels.

Whether he was to be a drummer or a general he had not yet decided, nor how he was to reach the envied military height; but he had several times seen a parade of militia at the neighboring town of Plaquemine, and his thoughts by day and dreams by night were full of the "pomp and circumstance of glorious war."

His mother smiled proudly and approvingly at her son's speech.

"It do beat all de way dat ar boy lubs sojerin'," she said. "He's jest borned one, and he's light complected like his Uncle Nathan, wot went out wid Marse James Anderson and fout in de war ob independince. Leastwise, Marse James he fout, and Nathan he seed de battles wid his own eyes.

"I'se been arter Jacob ter send Poleon ter dat milintary school dey calls West P'int, and let him foller de sojer trade. He's all de chile we'se got, Sis Cleopatry, and his pappy oughtn't ter hinder him; but Jacob is sot aginst de milintary, and he goes on awful when we talks 'bout it."

"He aint got no call to do dat," Mrs. Cleopatra replied, solemnly. "He's no pore folks, ter skimp and save so he kin gib his son an eddication. Folks do say Brudder Jacob has got a power ob money hid away, caze he don't believe in no banks."

Mrs. Mullins smiled mysteriously.

"I don't say yes and I don't say no, Sis Cleopatry. Sartain sure, Jacob Mullins don't b'lieve in banks, wot's always a-bein' robbed and breakin' and losin' folks' money. He says as how when he gits money, he's gwine to keep it."

"Wot's dat yer sayin', ole ooman, 'bout money?" and Mrs. Dinah, turning, saw her husband looking suspiciously at her.

Jacob Mullins was a strong, shrewd-looking old fellow, with rather a stern expression on his face.

She answered hastily: "I wor jest tellin' Sis Cleopatry you do'n b'lieve in no banks."

"Well, seein' as how I aint got no money ter put in no banks, it don't matter wot I b'lieves in. Is you goin', Mis' Allen? Well, good-mornin'!"

"Look here, ole ooman!" he said, as soon as the visitor had departed. "Wot was you sayin' 'bout money ter dat clack-tongue? Did you say as how I had any?"

"No, I didn't open my head 'bout it," Dinah said, half-frightened and half-angry. "But you knows you has it, and you keeps me dat short dat me and Poleon Bonyparte ain't got no decent clothes."

"I don't want no clothes!" piped Poleon. "Dad, I wants regimentals and a sword and a drum."

"Shut up, you idjit!" cried his father, furiously. "Go out and feed de cows, and ef you says regimentals ter me agin, I'll sojer you!"

Poleon Bonyparte obeyed sulkily. He thought his father very hard and miserly, for he knew he had money. Lying awake one night, when he ought to have been fast asleep, he heard his father and mother discussing the safest hiding-place for their earnings, and they decided upon a large knot-hole in the crib, or barn, over which a plank could be nailed, and which could only be reached by a ladder.

"Ebry night I'm calklatin' to see robbers break in," old Jacob said. "Dey s'picions as how I'se got de money in de house, but nebody'll tink ob de barn, sure. I don't b'lieve in buryin' money, specially bank-notes. Hogs mought root 'em up and damp git ter dem, but my knot-hole bank is safe and dry."

Neither father nor mother dreamed that Poleon had overheard this conversation, and I must say one thing for the would-be soldier: he was thoroughly honest, and would not have touched one penny of the money; but it made him chuckle and feel rich every time his eyes fell on the boarded knot-hole.

That evening, however, his mind was running on the gypsies. He must have his fortune told, whatever might come of it. He was the proud possessor of twenty-five cents, given to him that morning by Judge Cameron for holding his horse. He had determined to make it the nucleus for the purchase of a drum and sword, but the gypsies were going away, and he must know if futurity held regimentals for him.

He fed the cows, and hastened to the gypsies' encampment.

It was only a short distance from his father's farm, and he was quite familiar with the looks of the swarthy-browed men who had loitered about the farm to sell ponies, or mend pans and pots, until old Jacob ordered them from his premises. But many a peep had Poleon taken of their encampment, and they all knew him by sight and name. The camp was a scene of confusion that evening, for the gypsies were preparing to move.

A bright-eyed young woman approached the boy, who was standing irresolutely on one foot, as was his custom when perplexed. He had not made up his mind whether he would have his fortune told or not.

"And what does my pretty young gentleman want?" she said, with an insinuating smile. "We're going away before light to-morrow, and he must speak now, if he wants any thing."

"I comed ter hab my fortune tolt," Poleon stammered, "but I reckon you ain't got time. I ain't got but twenty-five cents, and I doesn't know if dat's enuff ter buy a good fortune."

The woman laughed, and stepping aside, beckoned to one of the men who stood near the wagons. Poleon recognized him as one of the most persistent haunters of the farm. A conversation ensued between him and the woman in a strange language, and in a few minutes she returned, smiling, to the boy.

"Will the young gentleman cross my palm with the silver," she said insinuatingly," and let me see his hand?"

Poleon laid a trembling palm in hers, and she studied it intently for a few minutes.

"I see a sword glitterin'," she said, in a low, mysterious voice, "and the brass buttons of a soldier. You're goin' to march to battle, but you won't be hurt—oh no. I see you a comin' back from the wars with banners flying and fife and drum playing, and I see—yes, I see gold epaulets on your shoulder—a Gineral's epaulets."

"O Lordy!" ejaculated Poleon, light-headed and fairly intoxicated by this picture of military grandeur.

"Yes," continued the gypsy, fixing her keen eyes upon the boy's face. "And then you'll march home in your grandeur, and your pa will pour all the hidden money at your feet, and say: 'It's yours, take it all.' Yes, every cent of the money he's hid, but I can see where it is"——

"Gracious!" cried astonished Poleon. "You kin see de money in de knot-hole in de barn and de plank kiverin' it, too?"

"Of course. I see the knot-hole and the plank nailed over it as plain as I see your face."

"Wot will pappy say when he hears dat?" cried Poleon, appalled at this display of what he thought superhuman power. He little dreamed who had betrayed the secret.

"If you tell him," said the gypsy, in a terrible voice, and frowning darkly, "if you tell him, your fortune won't come true—good-bye to soldiering. But if you are secret, come to-morrow, at sunrise, to that big oak yonder, and under it you'll find what you want most in the world."

Poleon ran home, his head in a whirl. He forgot all about the treasure, all about every thing but what he was to find the next day. Of course, it would be a uniform. He certainly wanted that more than any thing else in the world, and the gypsy had shown that she knew every thing.

He passed a sleepless night, and was up by daylight. But he did not go near the tree until sunrise, as the gypsy had told him. When he had reached the spot, there was nothing there but a bed of dry leaves, which he scattered about frantically. Nothing!

In his disappointment he threw himself on the ground and cried aloud. He had been basely cheated, and into his slow mind there began to creep the thought that he had been duped, and that the gypsies were imposters.

He walked slowly home, feeling utterly cast down, but when he neared the farm he heard unusual sounds which made him quicken his steps. At the door of the barn was his father, dashing about like a lunatic, tearing his wool, and uttering short, sharp cries. Dinah stood near, the picture of misery and despair.

"Ise been robbed! They've tuck all my money!" Jacob cried, as he saw his son. "De robbers is done broke in de knot-hole and the hunderd dollars is done gone. Saddle ole Jim, Poleon, and ride fur yer life ter de sheriff. Tell him ter come and cotch de tief. Run, boy!"

Poleon stood for a moment supeied. Then he had an inspiration.

"Dem gypsies has done tuck it, dad!" he cried. "They tolt me yisterday 'bout your money bein' in de knot-hole."

He forgot, or did not kow, the part he had taken in the little drama.

The old man gave him one sharp look, dashed off, saddled the pony, and was in town in a few minutes. The gypsies were pursued and Jacob was more fortunate than the most of those whom the fraternity victimize, for a part of the notes were recovered, owing to a private mark which the astute Jacob had put upon them.

As for what passed between father and son on that occasion, no one knows, but it is certain that "Poleon Bonyparte" seems to have lost his military proclivities. Like his great namesake, he has found his St. Helena.—Youth's Companion.

THE RULING PASSION.

Why an Eminent Judge Excused an Impertinent Witness.

In one of the coast States there lived two men of very dissimiliar dispositions, but whose similar taste in one thing led them to "meet together" on an occasion long remembered by many present. One was an eminent judge, and the other was the French keeper of a sailor's loft. The judge was holding court, and the loft-keeper was an important witness in a case before him. The witness was called, but he came not, nor answered. "Where is Suson?" asked the judge, impatient at the non-appearance of the witness.

"He will not answer, your honor?" replied the sheriff.

"Go and find him, and bring him into court?" cried the judge, sternly.

The sheriff went to look for him, and found the Frenchman a deeply interested spectator of a cock-fight then going on in the village. Returning to the court-room, he reported to the judge: "Your honor, Mr. Suson is looking at a chicken-fight, and says that all the judges in the State can't bring him away."

Immediately a change came over the judge's feelings and expression, and in a mild but earnest and clearly heard voice he asked: "Is it true, sheriff, that the cock-fight is now a-going on?"

"It is your honor," replied the sheriff.

"Well, gentlemen," said the judge, addressing the jury and lawyers, "I very much desire to witness that fight myself. The court is adjourned for half an hour."—Harper's Magazine.

ENGAGED YOUNG MEN.

A Jeweler's Clerk Tells How They Select Their Rings.

"It's funny to see the different ways in which various men select engagement rings, and when a man comes in here for that purpose every clerk in the store can recognize the fact at once. Of course he has only come in to look at some watches or a pair of sleeve buttons, but the very manner in which he avoids the ring case betrays him at once. After a few minutes, when he feels a little more at his ease, he usually takes the clerk into his confidence and asks to be shown some solitaires. If it's his first venture and he doesn't feel quite sure of his ground he will even go so far as to ask if solitaires aren't sometimes used as engagement rings. The clerk's answer usually removes the last vestige of doubt, and then the purchaser throws aside all reserve and selects from the assortment before him the ring which strikes the happy medium between the depth of his affections and of his pocket.

"Other men, again, walk in with the news just beaming from all over them. 'Engaged' is visible from the top of their heads to the soles of their feet. The purchaser of this class makes no secret of his errand, and usually departs on his way rejoicing in a very short time.

"From all indications I should say that this year will see any number of weddings. For the last month we have averaged three engagement rings a day."—Jewelers' Weekly.

A TERRIBLE WEAPON.

The Zalinski Dynamite Gun Intended for the Italian Government.

Captain E. L. Zalinski, the inventor of that terrible engine of war, the pneumatic dynamite torpedo gun, has been experimenting with the gun recently completed for the Italian Government which will cost $40,000.

This gun, in the language of Captain Zalinski, is an aerial torpedo projecting machine, possessing many advantages over the appliances for projecting the torpedo through the water. It is of 15-inch caliber, and its range will be at least one mile. The full caliber shell will carry 600 pounds of explosive gelatine, equivalent to 852 pounds of dynamite No. 1 or 943 pounds of gun cotton. Shells containing smaller charges can also be thrown. The gun barrel is a light tube, having a smooth bore. The loading is done at the breech. Air at 1,000 pounds pressure is admitted through a balanced valve, made so as to open and close by a single move of the operator. The time of opening and closing can be varied so that the range can be changed without altering either the elevation or pressure.

In order to maintain the pressure as nearly uniform as possible, wrought iron reservoirs of from twelve to sixteen inches in diameter and about twenty feet long are used, the air being supplied to them by any type of high pressure compressor. The power of this fifteen-inch gun is great. It is clear that the value of a weapon which can project a huge mass of powerful explosive equal to three-quarters of the entire bulk of the projectile to a distance of one and a half miles with perfect accuracy, can not be disputed. In Captain Zalinski's office is one of the shells to be used in the big gun. It is made of brass tubings and castings, as light as possible.

A tail tube with spiral vanes attached is annexed to the shell in order to retain it in its proper trajectory. Non-metallic pins in the head keep it central at this point and free from metallic contact, while a leather gas-check and vulcanized fiber projections keep it central at the tail. The charge thus far used has been uncamphorized explosive gelatine, having a core of dynamite. This core is for the purpose of producing a complete detonation of the less sensitive explosive gelatine. In the cruiser Yorktown are three of the new fifteen-inch dynamite guns, placed abreast and parallel to one another at a fixed angle of sixteen degrees.

The training of the gun is accomplished by steering the vessel, which is done by steam, and the running of the engines which drive the twin screws. The range can be varied by means of valves. The guns are required to be loaded twice per minute. The shells will be handled by hydraulic machinery and provision is to be made for the storage of thirty full-caliber shells. The gun for Italy, now completed, is to be trained, elevated and loaded by hydraulic machinery. It is mounted on an iron base, which when in place will rest upon a heavy masonry foundation. The Yorktown when completed will cost $350,000. This includes the guns. The speed of this vessel will be at least twenty knots. The speed is exceeded by the small and light torpedo-boats built abroad, but the Yorktown's hull will be sufficiently strong to be serviceable in rough water, which is not the case with the more lightly built torpedo-boats.

The torpedo shell has a double field of action, the over-water and under-water hull. It is estimated that the decks of the most heavily armed ships will be vulnerable to even the eight-inch torpedo shells charged with 100 pounds of explosive gelatine and a very large portion of the more heavily armored parts of the shell charged with 600 pounds.—Philadelphia Times.

THE SIGIRI ROCK.

A Steep Climb Accompanied by the Military Commander of Ceylon.

For the first time for a number of years the Sigiri Rock in Ceylon has been scaled by a European, the feat on this occesion being performed by General Lennox, who commands the troops in the island. It is said, indeed, that only one other European, Mr. Creasy, ever succeeded in reaching the summit. The rock is cylindrical in shape, and the bulging sides render the ascent very difficult and dangerous. There are galleries all round, a groove about four inches deep being cut in the solid rock. This rises spirally, and in it are fixed the foundation bricks, which support a platform about six feet broad, with a chunam-coated wall about nine feet high. The whole structure follows the curves and contours of the solid rock, and is cunningly constructed so as to make the most of any natural support the formation can afford. In some places the gallery has fallen completely away, but it still exhibits flights of fine marble steps. High up on the rocks are several figures of Buddha: but it is a mystery how the artist got there, or how, being there, he was able to carry on his work. The fortifications consist of platforms, one above the other, supported by massive retaining walls, each commanding the other. Owing to the falling away of the gallery the ascent in parts had to be made up a perpendicular face of the cliff, and General Lennox and four natives were left to do the latter part of the ascent alone. The top they found to be a plateau about an acre in extent in which were two square tanks, with sides thirty yards and fifteen feet respectively in length, cut out of the solid rock. A palace is believed to have existed on the summit at one time, although time, weather and the jungle have obliterated all traces of it. During the descent the first comer had to guide the foot of the next into a safe fissure; but all reached the bottom safely in about two and a half hours.—Chicago Herald.

TEMPERANCE READING.

DON'T FORGET THE BOYS.

They say the world is growing worse
With every changing year,
That we have nothing at all to hope,
And every thing to fear;
That reckless love of power and gain
All love of good alloys;
That Alcohol is bound to reign—
So don't forget the boys!—

The boys who are learning to know his wiles,
And to hate his very name,
To see behind his tempting smiles
That the end is woe and shame;
To turn away from the offered cup
That body and soul destroys,
Such noble boys we must ne'er give up—
No, don't forget the boys!

They form in line and proudly stand
Cadets of Temperance true,
Pledged to defend their native land,
And fight for its freedom, too;
Freedom from foes that harm the home
And ruin its sweetest joys.
An army of soldiers, brave and strong—
Oh, don't forget the boys!

'Tis true, they are only in training now,
But the boys will soon be men,
And out of our homes, and out of our schools
Will come our statesmen then.
A trumpet note of victory blends
With all their fun and noise;
You need never despair of the future, friends
If you don't forget the boys.

BEER AS A BEVERAGE.

A Drinking Habit That Produces Incalculable Harm—Opinions of Physicians—Life-Insurance Evidence.

There are many good people who look hopefully on the figures which show that the consumption of beer is increasing faster in this country than that of spirituous liquors—or, to use two distinctive terms which have come into the mouths of the people within the past few years, there is a greater use of "soft" than of "hard" drinks.

It is pitiful that there should be such extreme ignorance of the real evil of alcoholic drinks, whether brewed or distilled. To say that the beer habit is increasing does not mean that there is less drunkenness, for beer intoxicates, and its effects upon the drinker are as serious in the end as those of any other form of rum.

A New York reporter speaking of a certain locality in the east side of New York City, which is closely populated by the working classes, remarks: "Out of fifty women arrested here last summer, I learned that thirty of them got their first taste for liquor from beer." The havoc that is worked in our cities among the working population by the beer habit is comparatively unknown to the American public, even in the better quarter of the same cities. But it is a fact that beer is more often the beverage with a very large class than even water. They buy it by the quart at the doggeries and "corner groceries," which may be found on every hand in these densely-populated sections, each with a side door, with the legend "Family entrance," where women and children may resort with bucket or pitcher—a proceeding which is slangily referred to as "working the growler."

The remark of the reporter above quoted only adds one item to the proof everywhere accumulating that the use of beer by women has a tendency to create a taste for stronger stimulants. The danger in this direction is increasing in all our cities, and it is one of the most alarming features of social disorder. A beer-drinking mother becomes careless and neglectful of her children, and her example to them is most pernicious. A wife spending her husband's wages for beer is apt to be deceitful, and she robs home to gratify her habit.

The wreck of many families can be traced to this evil cause, and the talk of which we heard so much a few years back that lighter drinks would kill out the desire for stronger ones has turned out exactly the opposite. This beer habit has made the risk of marriage and of making homes by wage-earners greater than heretofore, and there can be no calamity equal to that of adding difficulties to the problem of civilization in this direction.

Aside from this moral deterioration of the victims of the beer habit, the destruction of the homes of the people, and the incalculable evil done to the children thus familiarized in early life with drunkenness and its inevitable concomitants, poverty and misery, there is great bodily harm resulting to those who indulge. There is a widespread belief, which is utterly erroneous, that beer is a wholesome drink, and that it is to some extent a food. Nothing could be further from the truth. The champions of beer point to the fact that the English laborers use beer largely as a beverage. This is true, but there is a wide difference between their beer and the kind made by American brewers. The percentage of alcohol in that made here is very much greater, and it is doctored with various kinds of chemicals that render it a poison. It may be instructive to quote the opinion of physicians upon the evils of beer drinking.

Dr. W. H. Mays, superintendent of the Stockton Insane Asylum, Iowa, in his report to the State Board of Health, has the following on the use of beer:

"Nothing will lower the vital forces so steadily and surely, nothing will degenerate the organic tissues so rapidly, as the use of beer every day and year after year. It coarsens a man in appearance, in morals, in mental fiber, in physical constitution. It is more productive of brutality, sensualism and the lower forms of crime than is whisky-drinking. It is the beverage of the Bill Sykes, of the vulgar ruffian, the bestial tramp."

Many of the older readers of the Blade will recall the testimony of several leading physicians of Toledo against the use of beer, published in these columns several years ago. These opinions were so strong, however, that we reproduce the more striking portions:

Dr. S. H. Bergen (thirty-five years' practice).—"It kills quicker than any other liquor. Pneumonia, pleurisy, fever, etc., have a first mortgage on the beer-drinker."

Dr. S. S. Thorne.—"In regard to surgicla operations every physician dreads to have any thing to do with beer drinkers. It is dangerous for a beer-drinker to even cut his finger."

Dr. M. H. Parmalee.—"Beer is worse than whisky, the hops contained in the beer producing congestion of the liver, dyspepsia and kindred diseases. Habitual beer-drinkers seem to have no power to resist disease."

Dr. W. T. Ridenour.—"Beer-drinkers are very liable to die of pneumonia, and when a confirmed beer-drinker takes pneumonia he dies."

Dr. S. S. Lungren.—"Every part of the body of a confirmed beer-drinker becomes loaded down with morbid and poisonous matter, and every part will soon fall into ruin and decay."

Dr. J. T. Woods.—"Lager beer, if used at all, should be used as a medicine, as are ipecac, quinine, rhubarb and strychnine."

Dr. C. A. Kirkley.—"There is no more fruitful source of Bright's disease than beer-drinking. The evil effects are not confined to the consumers of the beverage, but are transmitted to their offspring."

Dr. C. W. Chapman.—"I regard beer as harmful as ardent spirits, brandy and whisky, as it produces fatty degeneration of the heart, liver and kidneys."

Dr. G. A. Collamore.—"Beer-drinking produces a morbid effect upon the heart, lungs, brain, stomach, liver and kidneys. The brain is kept in a hyperemic condition which prevents normal cerebration or the accurate use of the mental faculties."

One more fact, and a weighty one, needs to be added to this array of scientific evidence against the use of beer. The business of life insurance is one which excludes mere sentiment. It is conducted upon rules ascertained from experience, and as the profits of the company depend upon the reasonable expectation of life of the persons insured, we may be certain that if they make any discrimination against the applicants upon the ground of their drinking habits, that discrimination must be based upon ascertained facts. It is a fact that the best and safest life insurance companies will not insure the life of a confirmed beer-drinker. A man not addicted to drinking, at the age of forty, is considered a good risk; a beer-drinker aged forty can get no insurance—because his life is held by too precarious a tenure. The risk is too great. These companies are even more careful against beer-drinkers than against whisky guzzlers, because beer sows the seed of disease and death in the system and renders the victim liable to death from an illness that would be but trifling in its effects upon a man of good constitution.

Beer is a form of rum which sodden the brain and vitiates the moral nature. It predisposes to melancholy, and it is beginning to be noted in our cities that a large percentage of suicides are among persons who use beer freely. It was long ago noted that this was the case in certain European capitals. As for its being a food, there is not as much nutriment in a barrel of it as in one loaf of honest bread. It is nauseous to the taste of one unaccustomed to it, and nothing but the alcohol in it could ever induce any one to swill it down. Deprived of its alcohol, it is a vile, ill-smelling, horrible-tasting stuff, not more inviting than a draught from a swill-barrel. The Legislature of Ohio recognized that beer guzzling is just as much of an evil as the drinking of any other form of rum when, a few weeks ago, it removed the distinction in the taxing law of the State and made the liquor tax the same for all varieties of rum—spirituous, malt or vinous.

It is time that the terrible error that beer-drinking is comparatively harmless by the side of the consumption of spirits should be corrected. That lie has been one of the most potent means through which the rum power has extended its empire over the people of this country. In its effects upon the confirmed drunkard it is certainly as bad as whisky, and to the majority it is but the introduction to the use of "hard" drinks. Beer should have no quarter from the friends of Temperance. No matter in what form rum appears, it is drank because of the alcohol in it, and for the sake of the exhilaration which that poison gives the system in the first stages of drunkenness. There is no safety for any one who indulges in any form of rum.—Toledo Blade.

TEMPERANCE ITEMS.

GREAT BRITAIN has 15,000 Temperance organizations.

A BREWER in Mishima, Japan, has turned his brewery into a church and school-room for girls.

IT is estimated that not fewer than three thousand alcohol-made lunatics are turned loose from the saloons upon the homes of the people once in every twenty-four hours.

CHOLERA is a terrible plague, but in its worst it never finds half as many victims as that other plague, alcohol, in its numerous forms, more enticing and more fatal than any other form of vice.

A GEORGIA man figures out that a man who regularly takes ten ordinary drinks of whisky a day and keeps it up for twenty years will in that time consume at least thirty-six barrels of the stuff.

ACCORDING to a Philadelphia paper the conversion of more drinking shops to milk and luncheon shops still goes on. It affords good suggestion for those who are obliged to take up a new business that a better business is ready for them.

GENERALLY the man of influence is quite content if he can thrust the saloon from the vicinity of his dwelling or street, and too apt to be careless of the solemn fact that in the poorer or less favored localities it flourishes and multiplies with marvelous fecundity.

IT has been the custom for small vessels known as "copers," loaded with all sorts of grog, to cruise about among the North Sea fishing fleets selling liquor to the sailors. Five European powers have now entered into an agreement for the suppression of this business, and have declared rum-selling illegal upon the high seas.

FOR OUR YOUNG FOLKS.

"GREYFRIAR'S BOBBY."

For Twelve Years and a Half He Never Spent a Single Night Away From His Master's Grave.

"That's a splendid book!" exclaimed my nephew Phil as he closed the last volume of Scott's 'Heart of Midlothian.' I wish I could go to Edinburgh myself and see all those places. Won't you tell us about it, Aunt Madge?"

"Oh do!" joined in Helen and Beth, and, as I smilingly assented, they all drew up to the great wood fire, which was the more cheerful for the chilly November storm which was howling outside.

"Well, Phil," I began, "I saw the very Heart itself in the pavement near the old church of St. Giles, but within a stone's throw there was something which interested me so much more even than that, that to-night I think I will tell you about 'Greyfriar's Bobby' instead.

"Not far from St. Giles is another open square facing the old church and grave-yard of Greyfriar's. In front of the church I saw a fountain, at which many tired and thirsty men and horses stopped to drink even while I stood near it, looking at the marble statue of a shaggy, homely, insignificant little dog, which surmounted the fountain.

"I felt sure that thereby hung a tale."

"Oh!" groaned Phil, "what a pun!"

"And you may know that my curiosity was well gratified when the old sexton inside the graveyard told me that the statue was of none other than 'Greyfriar's Bobby,' the most famous dog on record for his extraordinary fidelity to his master's memory.

"From the sexton and other sources, I finally obtained this true story of Bobby's life:

"In the year 1858 there came one day to Greyfriar's churchyard an humble Scotch funeral. A poor man named Gray was buried in a corner by the church, and only a few poorly clad mourners watched the sexton as he shoveled in the last spadeful of earth upon the newly-made grave. As they slowly left the spot no one noticed a little Scotch terrier, which crept pitifully back and moaning sadly lay down upon his master's grave. Not until the next morning when the sexton—or 'curator,' as the Scotch call him—passed that way did he see the poor little dog keeping guard over the newly made mound, lying on the damp, cold earth, as if to keep as close to his master as possible. Outside the gate of the churchyard, in big black letters, was posted an order: 'No dogs allowed within.' So the curator drove poor Bobby away, and put him outside the gate.

"The next morning he was again found there and was driven away in the same manner. The third morning was cold and rainy, and when the curator found the faithful dog still lying shivering on the grave his heart was touched. He gave him a little food and left him to his trust in peace.

"From that day, way back in 1858, until the day of his death in 1871, for twelve years and a half Bobby never spent a single night away from his master's grave! Did you ever hear of such devotion as that in a poor dumb creature, a little insignificant dog like Bobby?

"When the cold storms of winter set in, and the nights were often bitterly raw and cold, the old curator used to try to keep Bobby inside the house, where he could have a warm and comfortable shelter from the wet and chill, but Bobby always howled dismally whenever such attempts were made, and no matter how rough the night persisted in clinging to the spot, dearer to him than any other—his master's grave.

"As the months and years passed by, the mound where poor Gray was buried became leveled little by little till at last there was almost nothing to distinguish it from the surrounding ground, for the man had been too poor to have even a small footstone to mark it; but Bobby never forgot the spot, and his devotion to his master's memory attracted more attention than any costly monument. People who came from far and near to see the famous Covenanter's stone near by, where, two hundred years ago, the old Covenanters signed their names in blood, often took still more interest in the little terrier which was now known for miles around as 'Greyfriar's Bobby.'

"For a long time a weekly treat of steaks was furnished him by a certain kindly Sergeant Scott, of the city engineers. Then for many years a warm-hearted restaurant keeper near by, named Trail, fed him regularly. Bobby used to go to his house, near the churchyard, every day, punctually at twelve, being guided by the sound of the Edinburgh time-gun, which is fired every day at noon. For six years he was fed in this way, till one day the kind restaurant keeper was summoned to court for not paying the dog-tax demanded of every man who owned a dog. When Bobby's interesting story was rehearsed in court, and the judge was told how Bobby refused to attach himself to any owner, and spent nearly all his time by his master's grave, Mr. Trail was dismissed, though he expressed his willingness to pay the tax, if the dog would stay with him any longer than to obtain his midday meal.

"So the years passed on, and day by day there came to the graveyard new visitors, who were always interested in Bobby and his story, and who tried more than once, but in vain, to get possession of him.

"Finally eight years and a half had come and gone since Bobby began his faithful vigils, the old curator died, and a new one took his place. This new one was the clever old Scotchman, with kindly face and broad Scotch accent, who showed me around the churchyard, and told me about Bobby, and pointed out the spot where his master lay.

"Bobby lived four years after the new curator came, and though by this time he was growing old and feeble, he still crept every night, in fair weather or rough, summer and winter alike, to his master's grave.

"At last, twelve years and a half after he first came to the spot with the few mourners who attended Gray's funeral, faithful Bobby died, too; and if there is a Heaven for dogs, I firmly believe that he has now a high place there, along with Dr. Brown's 'Rab,' Walter Scott's 'Maida,' and all other noble dogs.

"Gray's grave has no longer a mourner, and would long ago have been forgotten but for the old curator, who shows the spot to each new-comer and never tires of telling of the faithful dog who guarded it every night for nearly thirteen years.

"Soon the old curator must die, too, if he is not already dead, and there will then be left only the fountain by the church-yard gate to remind the passers-by of dear, faithful, homely little 'Greyfriar's Bobby.'"

"That was a good story, said Helen, with a sigh of satisfaction.

"Yes," said her father, who had come in unnoticed and heard the last of the story. "It reminds me of a saying I once heard: 'A mother and a dog are the only two things in the world that seem to have absolutely disinterested love.'"—Delia W. Lyman, in N. Y. Independent.

JESSIE AND THE GOAT.

A Little Girl Who Kept Her "Thinking-Cap" On, Even Though She Was Frightened.

"Dear me! If only I could go home through the field. School was just out, and little Jessie May, warm and tired, looked longingly over the cool, green field. It was a much shorter way home, as well as more pleasant, to go through the field than to go around by the dusty road. But Mr. Rawson's goat was pastured there. He was a very cross old fellow, and the terror of the school-children. Mr. Rawson had said it was not at all safe for the small children to enter the field while the goat was there; so going home that way this afternoon was not to be thought of.

As Jessie cast a last longing look in that direction, before turning down the dusty road, she gave a cry of delight: "Why, I do believe old Billy is gone! I can't see him anywhere. Mr. Rawson must have taken him out of the pasture."

Climbing upon the fence, she looked long and carefully. No goat was in sight, so she jumped down from the fence into the long, cool grass of the field.

She had gone about half-way across, when Mr. Billy —— who all this time had been lying buried in the deep grass, taking his afternoon nap—gathered himself up for a good shake.

As he caught sight of Jessie tripping along, he gazed for a moment in astonishment. It was only for a moment, for the next instant he gave his head a vicious shake, as though to say: "What right have you here, I should like to know?" and started in hot pursuit.

Jessie soon heard the quick patter, patter, patter of his small feet. A terrified glance behind her showed her the goat, with lowered head, rushing directly at her. Oh, how swiftly she ran, but he was overtaking her.

Just as she despaired of making her escape, she saw a large stump where a tree had recently been cut down. It stood almost directly in her path, and was large enough for her to hide behind it.

Quick as a flash off came her white apron, and was as quickly tied around the stump, on the side toward whic the goat was coming.

With a wildly beating heart Jessie crouched behind the stump to await the result. She was completely hidden, and Mr. Goat, with head bent so low that he caught but a glimpse of the white apron, did not discover that it was the stump that wore it, and not Jessie. He came rushing on, and his head struck the stump with terrible force.

All was still, and when the trembling little girl ventured to peep around the stump there lay the goat, apparently lifeless. Seizing her apron, she sped swiftly over the rest of the field, and was soon at home safe in her mother's arms.

Was the goat killed? Well, he was so badly stunned that he did not revive for some time.

When Jessie was on her way to school the next morning she met Mr. Rawson coming out of the pasture. He did not know, until Jessie told him, what hurt the goat. When she had finished telling him about it he said: "Well! well! I must say you have a wise little head, not to let your 'thinking-cap' blow off as soon as you get frightened."—*Mrs. C. O. AUNT HELEN'S PLUCK.

A Venerable Lady Who Indulges in Gymnastic Performances.

I was making a call the other day at a house where the family aunt, an old lady well on toward ninety years of age, is an inmate. We were sitting quietly in the drawing-room, and I had just about reached the middle of a capital story, when I was interrupted by a startling series of thumps and whacks on the floor above. I paused for a moment, thinking it likely that my hostess would desire to rush upstairs at once and ascertain which particular boy had broken his leg or otherwise disabled himself; but she appeared to be perfectly unconcerned, and her husband endeavored to reassure me by saying: "Go on; there is no cause for alarm; it is only Aunt Helen practicing calisthenics."

Now, inasmuch, as Aunt Helen is, to my knowledge, between eighty-five and ninety years old, and, what is more important, has recently sustained a severe injury, so that she has to go on crutches, I took this remark of my host as a bad joke, and greeted it with a feeble attempt at a laugh. But I soon perceived that I had fallen into an error. A frown gathered on the lady's face, and my friend explained, seriously, that Aunt Helen, though lame, as I have said, and forced to pursue her exercise while standing on one leg, is yet so bent upon living that she engages for half an hour every day in certain gymnastic performances, the exact nature of which I do not quite understand.

I recall one similar spirit in history. Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough in Horace Walpole's time, lay very ill, with her attendants gathered at her bedside. "She must be blistered or she will die," whispered the physician. "I shall do neither," said the old Duchess, and she was as good as her word.—Boston Post.

SUING FOR DIVORCE.

A Story Illustrating Woman's Strange Dislike of Litigation.

The peculiarity of women, more than men, is crazes in doing things. Only in one point are they less given to craze than men. They don't like to go to law, not as a rule; and just as you often find things in life, when you meet with an exception its generally an incomprehensible one. A lawyer friend of mine, rather out of practice—that is, he hadn't yet succeeded in getting in—was seated in his lonely office one day thinking out the problem of how much the dignity of belonging to a learned profession was supposed to be considered as equal to income, when he was startled by a timid knock at the door. It was not one of his boon companions. It was not another briefless lawyer coming in to borrow a dollar. It was a female knock, distinctly the knocking of a tiny, gloved knuckle. It doesn't seem poetic to speak of a lady's "knuckle;" but facts are seldom poetical. It was not a book-agent, that was quite certain; so he invited her in. She came in. She was tearfully chipper.

"Is this a lawyer's office?"

"It is, madam."

"And are you a lawyer?"

He thought at first he would say that only a few people had hitherto believed it, but it might spoil his business. He bowed politely and offered her a chair. She sat down and unfolded the facts of the case. She had been badly treated by her husband. She had had at one time a few thousand dollars and she met a man who was "broke." He was good-looking. There is nothing so fascinating to a woman with a small bank account as a handsome man who is "broke." She immediately loves him. She loved him so dearly that she gave him her hand, heart and bank account. He squeezed the first, gracefully accepted he second, and grabbed the third. He started in business and made a fortune, and they had a good time for a year or two. He took advantage of her absence in the East to switch his affections on to another woman. There are a great many sidetracks in the sentimental part of life, and sometimes main lines cross one another effectually. Life is full of junctions, and it is when they come to a junction that the married couple have to look out for one another. Well, she had got out of the train for a minute, so to speak, and missed it. The case offered big chances. The man was wealthy, and the poor but brilliant lawyer saw a big contingent fee. He accepted the case for that contingent fee and undertook to put up the necessary preliminary expenses. The case moved along. He was out twenty dollars, and she was to come down and sign the papers. She came.

"Are the papers ready?"

"Yes. Here they are, madam. If you will put your name there——"

"Well, you can just tear them up."

"Tear them up! Why?"

"I don't want to go on with the case. I love him too well."

"Very well, madam. In that case ——"

"I'm very much obliged to you, and I am so sorry you've had all this trouble."

"Yes, madam. My bill will be fifty dollars."

"What? You said it wouldn't cost me a cent to begin the case."

"But you haven't begun the suit, and I am out a good deal for expenses."

"I won't pay it."

"If you don't, it will be one hundred dollars to-morrow."

She wouldn't pay. Next day he sent up a sheriff with an attachment, as a threat, at least. She came down, offered him twenty dollars, then thirty, then she proposed he should take her lace parasol. Finally she paid him fifty dollars, gave him a parting shot of polite language and went out. The curious part of the story was that inquiry elicited the fact that she had gone through the same process, except paying, with thirteen different lawyers in the city, all on the same proposition. —San Francisco Chronicle.

SAVED BY ACCIDENT.

How an Artist Turned Away an Indignant Husband's Wrath.

The other day a man was walking slowly up Miami avenue and encountered a man walking hurriedly down. They ran into each other, both drew off and apologized, and the one in a hurry added:

"I've been so mad all the morning I couldn't see straight."

"Nothing serious, I hope."

"Well, my wife had some photos taken and the artist made a botch job. I'm now on my way to punch his head."

"Can I see them?"

They were exhibited, and after a careful inspection, the gentleman said:

"My friend, you are way off. The work is well done, and you ought to be proud of your wife's looks."

"Do you mean it?"

"Certainly. There are not ten as handsome women in Detroit."

"Shoo!"

"It's a fact, and the work is that of a real artist. You should be more than satisfied."

"Well, I declare! I guess I've been too hasty, and I'll drop the matter right here. Glad I didn't punch the photographer's head."

"Yes, so am I," said the other to himself as he went his way.

It was the artist himself.—Detroit Free Press.

FLYING FOR HIS LIFE.

How Emperor William Once Had to Hide in Barns and Ditches.

This remarkable account, which has only now been made public, although the more important details were known, is abstracted from the unpublished memoirs of a diplomatist who was a participator in the events of the eventful year of revolution, and an eye-witness of much that concerned the late Emperor William of Germany.

In 1848, the year of the continental revolutions, the people of Berlin, following the example of those of Paris, raised barricades, and after four days' fighting the King, the elder brother of the late Emperor, who was then Prince of Prussia, ordered the Prince, who had been organizing the attacks on the barricades, to retire with the troops from Potsdam. Prince William sought an interview with the King, who refused to rescind the order, when the Prince broke his sword and, throwing it at his elder brother's feet, left the palace. The nobles and the aristocracy wished the King to abdicate in favor of the Prince, but the people were so enraged against the latter, in consequence of his ordering the barricades to be carried by the troops that he had to escape in disguise, whilst the democracy triumphed and paraded the King on horseback through the streets of Berlin. The Prince, disguised as a coachman, took refuge on an island in the river; but here he was not safe, and he fled to the Spardau; but, being known, the mayor talked of giving him to the democrats as a traitor to his country, and he was again obliged to have recourse to flight to save his life.

To save the crown jewels, the plate and the imperial treasuers from the clutches of the victorious party, it was necessary to remove them from the palace. Fortunately a private door opened on to the river, and the valuables were placed on board barges, which, for the purposes of disguise, were draped with black cloth, as though they contained the bodies of insurgents slain at the barricades. In this manner they were transferred to the railways, and reached Hamburg as merchandise, and were put on board a vessel about to leave for England. The Prince, however, had to leave the railway being threatened with death on several occasions; to save his life he had still further to disguise himself, cutting off his beard and wearing strange clothes. Wandering on foot he hid himself away in peasants' cottages and slept in barns. It was important that he should embark for England without being recognized. To accomplish this end he passed over the frontier on to Danish territory and arrived at last at a villa belonging to his friend Oswald, where, for the first time since he left Berlin, he enjoyed the luxury of a bed. The following day the Prince, under the name of Muller, embarked on board a vessel about to sail for London, accompanied by a single aid-de-camp.—London Queen.

USE OF GLYCERINE.

How it Can Be Made Available For Innumerable Purposes.

Few people realize the importance of the uses of pure commercial glycerine, and how it can be used and made available for purposes where no substitute is found that will take its place; and herein, Mr. Editor, if you will allow me space to speak of its utility, no doubt many of your readers will find an opportunity to thank you. As a dressing for ladies' shoes nothing equals it, making the leather soft and pliable without soiling the garments in contact. Where the feet sweat, burnt alum and glycerine—one of the former to two of the latter—rubbed on the feet at night and a light or open sock worn, the feet washed in the morning with tepid water, will keep them during the day free from odor, so disagreeable to those persons who are sufferers.

For bunions and corns Cannabis indious and glycerine, equal parts, painted on the bunion or corn and bound around with Canton flannel, adding a few drops of the liquid to the flannel where it comes in contact with the affected parts, will soon restore to health.

As a face lotion, oatmeal made in a paste with glycerine two parts, water one part, and applied to the face at night, with a mask worn over, will give in a short time, if faithfully pursued, a youthful appearance to the skin.

As a dressing in the bath, two quarts of water with two ounces of glycerine, scented with rose, which will impart a final freshness and delicacy to the skin.

In severe paroxysms in coughing, either in coughs, colds, or consumptives, one or two tables poonfuls of pure glycerine in pure rye whisky or hot rich cream will afford almost immediate relief; and to the consumptive a panacea is found by daily use of glycerine internally, with the proportion of one part of powdered willow charcoal and two parts of pure glycerine.

For diseased and inflamed gums, two parts of golden seal, one part of powdered burnt alum, and two parts of glycerine, made in a paste and rubbed on the gums and around the teeth at night, strengthens and restores the gums to health, provided no tartar is present to cause the disease, which must be removed first before applying.

And finally, the epicure who relishes a nice breakfast dish of fried fish, will find "a feast for the gods" by frying the fish in glycerine to a brown, adding a small sprig of parsley when nearly done.—J. S. Charles, D. D. S., in Scientific American.

Hints and Suggestions Concerning the Latest Dress Novelties.

French percale remains a popular material for serviceable wear in women's undergarments.

French nainsook is the material from which imported French gowns are made.

Imperial lawn, a goods finished like a linen cambric, is used for matinee sacques and gowns.

The materials used for trimming in hand-made French underwear are real Valenciennes lace and French laces in same patterns.

Small black mantles of Bengaline, silk or embroidered cashmere, trimmed with metallic cord passementeries, are worn with dresses of all kinds.

Corset covers are cut high at the back, with Pompadour front or pointed front, the pointed styles being a feature of the season in all undergarments.

Gloves having wide bands of stitching, in self or contrasting colors, are still in vogue, nevertheless the plain styles are quite as desirable as ever.

For little girls, from three to ten years of age, white muslin frocks are made up of open embroidery in all-over designs to be worn with guimpes.

Short skirts and walking skirts are shown in lawn and nainsook, with trimmings of fine quarter-inch tucks and insertion and borders of embroidery and lace.

Babies just in short clothes wear tiny shoes of embroidered cashmere, white, blue or pink, with bows and two rows of ribbon up the front and tassels on the sides.

Matinees are of surah, nainsooks and various other materials.

Scotch ginghams for frocks for even the tiniest girls are chosen in large plaids and wide irregular stripes. Plain colors are also made up for their use.

The new French shapes in gowns are in most instances considerable higher in the neck than last season. The features of the Directoire styles are reproduced in many of the new shapes.

Many polonaise costumes are noted among the spring importations. The polonaise is usually of fine wool, and the skirt of Bengaline or other repped silk.

The first choice in embroideries are those from the French manufacturers, which copy faithfully the patterns and style of needlework.

A novelty in footwear is a house shoe of Russian leather, which may be obtained in both the crimson and tan colors. Some neat examples had small studs of cut steel or bronze on the instep.—N. Y. World.

AMERICAN WOMEN.

Some of Those Who Cut Quite a Figure in European Politics.

The two most powerful republican statesmen in France are married to American women. Waddington was married to an American woman in England, and Clemenceau was married to a Yankee girl on her native heath. Waddington is the son of English parents, but a native of France and a thorough Frenchman in tastes and instincts. Clemenceau, when he was exiled from his country in the time of the Little Napoleon, settled for awhile in the United States and taught school in Connecticut.

There was a bevy of marriageable young girls in his set, and all were engaged to wed but one. He persuaded the one to accept him, and the last engaged was the first to be married. Clemenceau hastened home at the breaking out of the Franco-Prussian war, fought for his country, and when peace came, he took an active part in politics. He is called an extreme radical in France, but in this country he would pass for a conservative. He is a thorough republican, and is ambitious to plant the main stems of the United States Constitution in France. Mrs. Clemenceau is the head of the house, and has the pleasure of knowing that her husband is one of the most domestic and best regulated men morally in French public life.

Some eminent British politicians, too, are wedded to Americans. Sir William Vernon Harcourt, Gladstone's first lieutenant in command of the Liberal party, is married to the daughter of John Lathrop Motley, at one time Minister to England. Harcourt bears the reputation of being gracious to his wife only. He has the ugliest disposition of any man in English public life. He can seldom say a kind word of anybody but his wife when a gruff word will answer as well. In this country he would stand no chance in politics, but in England members of Parliament and public men generally seldom come in contact with the great body of the people. Harcourt can mount a platform and larrup the Tories for hours at a time, and that satisfies his Liberal constituents.

The wife of Thomas Power O'Conner, Mr. Parnell's ablest lieutenant, is also an American, the daughter of the late Judge Paschall, of Texas.—St. Louis Republican,

How to Manage Manure.

Mr. Waldo F. Brown, a noted Ohio farmer, says it is a common practice to throw the manure from the stable out of a window and allow it to accumulate in a heap against the barn, where it rots the building and often contaminates the air of the stable. Fresh manure should never be left in a conical heap. Probably the best way to manage it is to spread it evenly in an adjoining shed in which stock is kept loose to tramp it. If, however, it is put out of doors it should always be wheeled away from the building and mixed with the cow manure and waste from the straw-stacks.—N. Y. Witness.

A Bone Yard of Nature.

During a recent visit in Colorado we were detained for some hours at Canyon City, and in looking for something to help us pass the time away we were directed to the so-called bone yard. We went as directed, and I am constrained to say that among the innumerable natural curiosities of this strange and curious country none posesses a deeper interest than this place. Here is the rarest and finest geological display I have ever seen. The little stream through whose canyon we approached the now famous fiel' leaves in many places the formation cut cleanly down three thousand feet, showing all the stratifications. The whole country for many miles around is much broken, and the dip or inclination of the rock is such that in traveling from Canyon City to this strange and interesting quarry, we pass over the exposed edge of all the formations from the tertiary to the silurian periods. But the exposure only becomes of more than usual interest as we enter the canyon of Oil Creek, where the walls rise sheer and clear cut above you, showing the stratification through many geological periods. The Bone Yard proper but seven or eight miles out of Canyon City, but the interest continues for the student of nature, especialy if a geologist, for many miles beyond. We found the superintendent, Captain Felch, at the base of the cliff, and in answer to our inquiry as to the location of the mine from which they dug mastodons and many other curious fossels, he pointed to a dizzy height up the perpendicular side of the canyon where a sandstone strata cropped out. Looking up we saw a stretch of white sail-cloth that protected the redeemed treasures from the disintegrating action of the elements. "Yes," said the superintendent, "this spot and in fact all about here is a perfect geological mine, but, as a matter of fact, these saurian remains in the Jurassic exposures about here are found in greater abundance and perfection than any other place yet discovered. Something like twenty millions of years ago this spot without doubt was the mouth of an old Jurassic river, and, therefore, a natural feeding ground for semi-amphibious creatures whose remains are now being excayated. This sandstone is a perfect mass of bones and the variety of animal remains is greater than at almost any other place in the world. Many of them, too, are highly specified. To explain: Some of the animals whose remains we find had become known to the scientist, but occasionly some are found having such well-marked specialties (that is, individual features,) as to require a new or revised classification. And now and then we find some things that, when they become known, will startle the whole scientific world. We think that we have found a link here that will connect two classes of animal life to all appearances more distinctly seperated than man and monkey."

The superintendent took me up to the edge and showed me the sandstone quarry where the bones were obtained. The journey was worth a pilgrimage to any one of those who see earth's history in rocks and read the tablets of the stratifications which are the sepulchers that hold the bones of her dead self—all who have visited this spot have been wonderfully interested. Although the place is unknown to the millions, there are but few spots in Colorado that have received the attention of distinguished scholars equal to this.

After some moderately hard climbing we arrived at the quarry, and, distinctly visable in the soft gray sandstone of the Jurassic era in which they had become mired and perished are the petrified forms of huge monsters fifty feet in length. The utmost care is required in getting them out and the labor of three men has been engaged in this service for three or four years. This is all done for the museum of Yale college and paid for out of the Peabody fund. The scientific interest of this museum has been materially increased by the remains taken from this quarry and the work will no doubt continue so long as new or special forms continue to be found.

We find in working over this field and its products that the forms of nature change, but her methods are continuous. The work that went on here at the mouth of this ancient river millions of years ago, is now, to a limited extent, going on in the deltas of all large rivers that empty into the ocean. Such rivers carry down food that is relished by certain fish and sea animals that come to these places where the river debouches feed. Here also comes the larger and stronger of their kind to prey upon the weaker. We know that the largest animals and fishes of our time get mired and cast ashore and thus perish. When these species become extinct their bones will in time become curiosities. Thus nature continues to write her history upon the rocks, which speak it forth to man as he slowly and laboriously turns the difficult and rarely understood pages of her book. This is a civilizing and refining work. Whether it be that only gentle natures engage in it, or that it has the magic to work gentleness in the heart of those who do this kind of work, it is, at least, my observation that savageness is at the very lowest point in those who commune much with nature through any of her forms.

This quarry is not the only place in the vicinity where nature can be studied, for in a large spring near the Superindendent's house we saw how these curious little worms in the bottom cover themselves with a preparation of silica and lime extracted from the water, making shells for themselves to live in. We had been witnessing water snails build their houses over their own bodies; and what an admirable location wherein to rear a family.

Farmers and the Tariff.

[Iowa State Register.]

The free traders have had a great deal to say about change in sentiment on the tariff question throughout the Noathwest. They have pretended to discover evidence of free trade sentiment among the farmers in all the Northwestern States. The resolutions of a few political farmers in Minnesota the other day have been taken as the text for much congratulation and rejoicing by the free traders. But the sentiment of the average farmer, even in the Northwest, is not represented by the free trade Junta that has attempted to speak for them. The farmers of Iowa, for instance, who have just as much reason to be free traders as have the farmers of Minnesota, take no stock in the fallacious theory, and appreciate the dangerous effect it would have upon their interests. Their sentiments are well expressed in the resolutions of the State Grange at its annual session last December.

Resolved—1. That the time has arrived in the history of our State and Nation when the farmers should unite for the protection of their rights and the promotion of their interests, morally, socially, intellectually and financially.

2. We demand such a revision of the tariff laws as will protect the producer as well as the manufacturer.

3. That the part of President Cleveland's message referring to the reduction of the tariff is a direct blow at the farmers of this country and in favor of monopoly.

4. That a great reduction of the tariff on all raw material produced in this country would greatly embarrass the agriculturalists, while it would not accomplish the object sought, viz: A reduction of the revenue.

5. That a reduction of the tariff on articles produced in this country would not reduce the revenue, but increase the imports, and therefore depreciate the value of our produce.

6. That to reduce the revenue the tariff should be made so high on all articles produced in this country as to prohibit the importation of such articles, and all articles that are not produced in this country should be admitted free of duty.

7. We demand equal protection with all other classes and professions.

This shows what the intelligent farmers of Iowa think of free trade. They know that it is not only a peril to the manufacturing districts of the East, that it means disaster to the farming communities of the West. The people who are trying to discover a free trade boom in the West are invited to inspect these resolutions of the farmers of Iowa.

HOMOEOPATHY.—A good Homœopathic book—a "domestic physician"—is a medical missionary in many families and a trusty adviser in all; to one of these add a case of Homœopathic medicines and the family is as well prepared to meet sudden emergencies and sickness as human foresight can provide. The cost is not great, and when compared with the advantages sinks out of sight. Catalogue and price list mailed free on request. Our medicines are kept by leading druggists who will give also our valuable little Medical Index free. It is safest to buy medicines bearing our labels for they are known to be strictly reliable by the medical profession of America and Europe. "The Blue and Gray."

In a circular issued recently by the committee of the Philadelphia Brigade it is stated that "one of the fraternal results which grew out of the reunion of the blue and gray at Gettysburg last July will be the annual decoration by Confederate vetaans of the graves of those who fell in defense of the Union. This touching ceremony will begin in Virginia, and wherever the grave of a Union soldier can be reached by one of Pickett's men a flag or flower will be tenderly laid upon it." A copy of that circular was sent to Col. William R. Aylett, the renowned orator of Virginia, and he replied: "You judge us aright, for there is not a true and brave veteran of Pickett's division but whose heart would melt and soften at the grave of a comrade of the Philadelphia Brigade. Whenever and wherever such a grave could be found it represents to us the buried worth and valor of those men whose guests we were at Gettysburg in July, 1887, on the spot where our blood mingled with theirs in 1863; and while the flowers bloom and the birds are singing in soldiers' cemeteries can any one suppose that our veterans would not be as ready to decorate the Union graves as our own? Nothing has contributed so much to the growth of this sentiment as our reunion last July."

No Flies on Him.

BENNETTSVILLE, IND., May 20.—This little burg holds within its confines a remarkable freak. This wonder is Henry Luegeman. Three years ago during a storm he was engaged in gathering tan-bark, when the tree from which he was taking it was struck by lightning. Luegeman received a severe shock. It transformed him into a genuine [illegible] man.

Anyone who shakes hands with Luegeman now receives a severe shock. By passing the blade of a knife between his thumb and finger during the progress of a storm, he charges the metal so strongly that heavy weights could be lifted. When flies alight upon him they drop dead and when he is in a dark room sparks flash from his flesh and his eyes shine like incandescent lights. Whenever a storm approaches Luegeman becomes highly charged with electricity and it is dangerous to touch him. He claims to feel no inconvenience, except that he will go near no moving locomotive for fear of being drawn against it and killed.

Abolish the Internal Tax.

The Internal Revenue tax is hostile to the moral sentiment of the country. It is directly in the interest of the whiskey distillers, the brewers and the tobacco manfacturers. It upholds the monopoly of the rich and panders to the vices of the community. These are propositions that receive the assent of teachers of morality, of the churches, of the Women's Christian Temperance Union and of all friends of temperance.

The economic question before Congress is the tax question. The revenues must be reduced, and that object can be accomplished only by a reduction of taxes. There is no other way to put an end to the accumulating surplus except by increasing expenditures, and while expenditures may be economically increased, they ought not to equal our present excessive revenues. Reduction of taxation is demanded by both parties. The Republican party insists that this reduction shall be effected by the abolition of the Internal Revenue tax. The Democrats say that the tariff must be revised in the direction of free trade. In the first place, they do not know that their scheme will reduce taxation; in the second place, even if it would, they would destroy American industries for the sake of relieving the Treasury.

The Republicans seek to destroy the vicious tax. The Internal Revenue tax was devised for the purpose of raising money for the prosecution of the war. The war is over and the tax remains. It simply brings money into the Treasury, while custom duties add to the country's wealth. In more than one way it is an odious tax. It rests in part upon the products of the soil. It hampers the farmer who grows a small crop of tobacco. It sustains an army of office holders, many of whom are spies and informers, It makes the government a partner in the liquor traffic.

Last year the taxes collected from spirits amounted to $65,829,322. Much of this product was alcohol used in the arts and in medicine. This tax should be abolished, because it is productive simply of evil. When the Democrats answer this position, they say that the Republicans are in favor of making whiskey cheap, while they maintain the tariff tax on the necessaries of life, They know that this is not ingenious. They know that the Internal Revenue tax on whiskey, large as it is in the aggregate, does not add more than half a cent to the price of a drink. Who is so absurd as to say that half a cent a drink will restrain a drunkrd's appetite? The tax does not accomplish any good. Judge Pitman, of Massachusetts, well known as a leading temperance advocate, says of the liquor tax, that it is "opposed to the better moral instincts," and is "operative as a bribe to pervert the public conscience."

The tax enables the rich distillers to combine and secure a monopoly of their business. When a tax of ninety cents a gallon is added to the great expense of producing whiskey, the government enters directly into partnership with the men who are making millions of dollars every year in the liquor traffic. Therefore, it is "opposed to the better moral instincts." When the government pays its expenses by giving this monopoly to the large distillers, it helps to "pervert the public conscience." There is no escape from this conclusion.

Similar arguments may be made against the taxes on tobacco and fermented liquor. The tax on bank circulation is very small, being only $4,288. It is a relic of a time when our necessities were so great that the government was compelled to resort to extraordinary methods of taxation. The bank tax ought to be abolished because if it were of any account it would be a burden on exchange and trade, while as it is, it is not worth while collecting.

The whole amount collected last year by the Internal Revenue Bureau was $118,837,301, and the cost of collection was $4,005,149. The total abolition of the tax would therefore wipe out the surplus and cure the money congestion in the Treasury. The government ought to take its countenance from the distillers of whiskey, the brewers of beer and the manufacturers of tobacco. The Republican party favors sound legislation against intemperance and the saloon, and that legislation must be in the statutes of the several States. The federal government is too far away from the evil to be dealt with even if it has the necessary power under the Constitution. As the law is now, however, the federal government is the partner of the liquor dealers. Its tax affords them an argument why the State should not cut deeper and take their power away. This might not be a party question, but it is. The Democrats stand by the distillers, and insist that the customs revenues shall be reduced in order that the internal taxes may be continued. All good men who believe in killing the political power of the saloon, hailed with delight the opportunity to strike a blow at the distillers which was afforded by our superabundant revenues. To them the need of reducing taxation seemed to be the occasion for dissolving the government's partnership with the liquor traffic. But the tariff reformers stand in the way. They cry out, "Hands off the sacred Bourbon idol of Kentucky!" And so the friends of temperance find, as usual, the Democratic party standing in their pathway, snivelling hypocritically some rigmarole about cheap whiskey and dear blankets. Nevertheless the fact remains, and it is a fact that no one can successfully dispute, that the abolition of the internal revenue taxes is not only the certain way of reducing taxation and the revenue, but it will accomplish a great moral reform at the same time.

When the Republicans come to deal with this important question in the Senate they will not be deterred by the untruths which are shrieked out by the enemies of American industries. They will gratify the usual sentiments of the country and offer a sane and proper solution for our financial problem by firmly cutting the bond between the government and the liquor traffic.—*N. Y. A Strange War Duel.

Georgia Union.

On the 12th of June, 1863, I witnessed a duel between Captain Jones, commanding a federal scout, and Captain Fry, commanding a rebel scout, Greene county, East Tennessee. These two men had been fighting each other for about six months, with the fortunes of battle in favor first of one and then the other. Their commands were encamped on either side of Lick creek, a large and sluggish stream, too deep to ford and too shallow for a ferryboat, but there a bridge spanned the stream for the convenience of the traveling public. Each of them guarded this bridge, that communication should neither go north nor south, as the railroad track had been broken up months before. After fighting each other several months, and contesting the point as to which should hold the bridge, they agreed to fight a duel, the conqueror to hold the bridge undisputed for the time being. Jones gave the challenge and Fry accepted. The terms were that they should fight with navy pistols, twenty yards apart, deliberately walking toward each other and firing until the last chamber of their pistols was discharged, unless one or the other fell before all the discharges were made. They chose their seconds, and agreed upon a rebel surgeon (as he was the only one in either command) to attend them in case of danger.

Jones was certainly a fine-looking fellow with light hair and blue eyes, five feet ten inches in height, looking every inch the military chieftain. He was a man soldiers would esteem and ladies regard with admiration. I never saw a man more cool, determined and heroic under such circumstances. I have read of the deeds of chivalry and knight errantry of the middle ages and brave men embalmed in modern poesy, but when I saw Jones come to the duellist's scratch, fighting, not for real or supposed wrongs to himself, but, as he honestly thought, for the glory of the flag, I could not help admiring the man, notwithstanding he fought for the freedom of the negro, which I was opposed to.

Fry was a man full 6 feet high, slender, with long, wavy curling hair, jet black eyes, wearing a slouch hat and gray suit, and looked rather the demon than the man.

There was nothing ferocious about him, but he had that self-sufficient nonchalance that said, "I will kill you." Without a doubt he was brave, cool, and collected, and although suffering from a terrible flesh wound in his left arm, received a week before, he manifested no symptoms of distress, but seemed ready for the fight.

The ground was stepped off by the seconds, pistols loaded and exchanged, and the principals brought face to face.

They turned around and walked back to the point designated. Jone's second had the word "Fire," and as he slowly said "One—two—three—fire!" they simultaneously turned at the word and instantly fired. Neither was hurt. They cocked their pistols and deliberately walked towards each other, firing as they went. At the fifth shot Jones threw up his right hand, and, firing his pistol in the air, sank down. Fry was in the act of firing his last shot, but, seeing Jones fall, he silently lowered his pistol, dropped it on the ground, and sprang to Jones' side, taking his head in his lap as he sank down and asking if he was hurt.

I discovered that Jones was shot through the region of the stomach, the bullet glancing around that organ and coming out to the left of the spinal column; besides, he had received three other frightful flesh wounds in other portions of the body. I dressed his wounds and gave him such stimulants as I had. He afterward got well.

Fry received three wounds—one breaking his right arm, one the left, and the other in the right side. After months of suffering he got well and fought the war out to the bitter end, and to-day the two are partners in a wholesale grocery business.

A Difference.

Some of our Democratic contemporaries are endeavoring to take much comfort from what they are pleased to term the "Republican situation." Here it is, they say, only a few weeks till the meeting of the national convention and the party is utterly at sea as to who its candidates will be. Very good. So it is. But what is there alarming in this? In 1880 the party was "at sea" even after the convention had assembled, and yet it selected candidates that were able to give the Democracy a good, sound drubbing.

There is nothing discouraging in the situation, so far as the Republicans are concerned. Material for the construction of a ticket is abundant, and it is available. The trouble is to discover whom the Republicans of the country want, and that is a very small trouble. One or two days at Chicago will settle that, and settle it satisfactorily. There is one thing, however, upon which the Republicans are not at sea. There is no uncertainty as to their platform. On all the important questions before the country it will be courageous and outspoken for the right. It will demand that American labor and American interests be protected and promoted in preference to foreign labor and foreign interests, and that elections shall be fairly and honestly conducted in all sections of the Union alike. There will be no higgling, no evasion, no hypocrisy about that platform; it will be a bold and candid utterance, like it always is.

But how is it with Democracy? It has but one candidate, it is true; and he will be nominated by acclamation, not because the majority of Democrats want him, but because he has a death grip on the party. But while the nominee of the St. Louis convention is in effect already named, it is not at all certain what its platform will be. The probabilities is that in spite of the bold stand taken by the President the question that is more prominent before the country will be dodged or straddled. The tariff plank will be framed in language so ambiguous as to be susceptable of a double construction and adaptable to every locality and shade of belief; as heretofore, it will be "All things to all men."

While there is doubt as to who will be the Republican candidate, there is no doubt as to what will be the Republican platform; while there is no doubt as to the Democratic candidate, there is great doubt as to the platform upon which he is to stand. The Republicans are sure of a good candidate on a certain platform; the Democrats are sure of a bad candidate upon an uncertain platform. Who has the best of the situation.—Exchange.

THE UNSEEN VICTOR.

There are no perils that the valiant hearted
Will fear to meet, if they but serve the right.
A noble purpose planted in the spirit
Will give to every one an arm of might.

We need not fear, though hosts should rise against us,
If in the path of duty we are found;
We shall be victors in the battle tempest,
Though to the cross our bleeding forms be bound.

It is the soul that triumphs, not the faggots
That, burning, slay the martyrs at the stake.
From rock and dungeon oft have risen the spirit
That caused earth's tyrants on their thrones to shake.

Better by far it is to toil and struggle
And bear life's burden o'er a thorny way,
Than to sit idly down where gilded pleasure
Holdeth her court, and cheats her votaries gay.

Better the wealth of heart, the gifts of feeling,
Though worn with suffering, penury and toil,
Than all the diamonds in the mines that glisten,
Or all the gold in California's soil.

We cheat ourselves when earthly treasures win us
From our allegiance in the cause of truth.
We sell our souls, or make them "aproned waiters"
To passions that but work us care and ruth.

There are defeats that mar the plans we cherish
That may be triumphs in the years to come;
And battle scars that we shall wear as trophies
Of victories won, when we have wandered home.

MY FIRST PATIENT.

The Innocent Mr. Hardy and His Burdened Conscience.

"Did you ever hear, Dick, that I had turned physician and had serious thoughts of endowing a hospital?"

These words were spoken by an eminent lawyer to an intimate friend in the same profession, as the men were relating mutual experiences.

"Why, no; I've heard at rare intervals of the preacher practicing, but never any thing so good of the lawyer. How is it?"

"Do you remember Hardy?"

"Julius Hardy of college days?"

"Yes."

"That dear sensitive soul, who knew nothing outside of books, but every thing inside, from Egyptian hieroglyphics to the laws of heredity—from the world in embryo to the prospective millennium?"

"The very same."

"Good. Tell me about him. I haven't heard a word of him for years."

"Settle back then, Dick, and take it easy. It is quite a romantic story."

I was sitting in my office one day, scowling over a mass of evidence in as muddy a case as you can well imagine, when a rather well dressed stranger came in, and, seeing me occupied, rested himself quietly in the farthest corner of the room.

My mental ejaculation was not taken from the new version. He wore the clerical habit and looked solemn. I was neither in need of ghostly consolation, nor in the mood for throwing out ballast to keep the spiritual ship from sinking. I studied his profile askance, and saw that it indicated the lawyer's natural enemy. "If a man smite thee on the one cheek, turn to him the other also, sort of a man," so I delved away and paid no apparent attention to him.

He was so perfectly motionless and statue like, that I fell to studying him, when he turned slowly and bent his gaze full upon me. A slow glimmering of recollection dawned upon me, and the next moment, I had thrown down document and decision, cleared the floor at two strides, and grasped him by both hands.

"Judas, as sure as I live!" I said. You remember the pseudonym we gave him, by virtue, I suppose, of its utter contrast with his character.

"Yes, yes, poor fellow! how could we have been so cruel?"

"He never thought of it in that light, Dick. He recognized our friendship, and knew full well that we both loved him."

"Why on earth didn't you speak," I said, "and not sit there like a block? How are you? How are wife and children?"

My boisterous greeting almost took away his breath, as he answered each question separately, laughing a little about wife and children, for he was a bachelor. A gleam of genuine gladness lighted up his pale face.

"I thought you might quite have forgotten those old days, John, and I was more than ever convinced of it when you maintained such reserve," he said, quietly.

"Goodness, man! who could recognize Julius Hardy's boy face under such troubadour blackness of mustache and beard? But they become you, and do not look unclerical. Off with overcoat and wraps, man!"

"I fear you are very busy," he said, glancing rather timidly at my piled-up table, but looking a wish to remain.

"No, no, you may take a book until I get through with a small matter, then we will go home together. You must meet my wife and see my various olive branches."

"I should like to see them, John, indeed, but I am a recluse. Really you will have to excuse me."

"Delmonico's, then."

"No, I thank you. I beg pardon, my dear brother, I have something on my mind. I have a few days at my disposal, and can take your most leisure time, but I really wish a little private talk with you on a subject that concerns me deeply."

"Can it possibly be a lawsuit?" I asked myself. Some one has made him believe that he has been guilty of encroachment on another's right, for he would never act except on the defensive. He would give away all but his soul for the sake of peace.

"I am quite at liberty now," I said, thrusting my papers into a drawer, with a sigh of relief, and pulling a chair up close to my side. "Go on Julius, I should really like to be of some service to you, my dear fellow;" but seeing him look so forlorn about the matter, I attacked him by a little raillery as a reassuring precess.

"Have you been borrowing sermons?"

"No."

"Buying a few votes for president?"

"O, no."

"Freezing to your neighbor's melon patch?"

"Do, John, enter into the spirit of my trouble, for I assure you it is a real one."

I began in my turn to look sober. Ignorance of the world's ways is quite as often as knavery the source of trouble to an unsuspecting person. What had he been led to do?

"Well?"

I had to recall his mind, once or twice, from apparent wool-gathering.

"I fear John, I really fear that I have fallen in love with another man's wife!"

"Heavens and earth!"

I started to my feet and walked towards the window to control a convulsion of laughter; I knew he was mistaken. I knew it must be some hallucination, but for him the incongruity of the thing was dreadful.

"I knew you would regard this thing in its true light, John, and I honor you for it. I can not help remarking the contrast between you and him—the clergyman of my neighboring parish, the only other friend I had spoken with on the subject, and he does not know all, by half. But when I spoke of it, to relieve burdened conscience, he did nothing but laugh, and said it was a good joke, and he hoped to hear of an elopement. Think of that, John, to me a minister of the gospel, trying to see light and to do right. How could I gather any spiritual strength from him? You have proved yourself true, as you always are."

You may be sure, Dick, I kept my countenance grave during the rest of the interview. I saw that he had dwelt on this subject until his mind had become morbid, and he could think of nothing else.

I addressed him by the old name with some reference to a scene of our early life together in order to keep his mind in a more cheerful mood.

He broke into a sort of November smile, and said:

"That name, John, sounds so much like old merry times that I have almost forgotten how wretchedly I felt when I came to you. You were always like the sunshine. You do not change, I see. As for me, I have seen cloudy, dark days since then."

"No doubt, no doubt. Well, January makes us prize June, and dark clouds the bright sunshine. I've had to face some pretty tough hills myself since then, but it was the delectable mountain at the top, Julius, and so it may prove at length with you."

He shook his head slowly. "I fear John, I have committed a great sin."

"Unconsciously, then," I said, "for I would be willing to wager my best pony, you have never done any thing wrong, consciously, in all your life."

"You mistake. You always thought of me better than I deserved."

"Was it an injury to any one but yourself?"

"I am not sure. Indirectly it has been, for it has hampered me in my work."

"It must be a desperate case." I said this without a very genuine feeling of sorrow for the imagined wrong, but he replied at once:

"Yes, I knew you would so regard it; your conscience is not seared."

I took another stride across the floor as a sedative; then came and stood before him.

"You know I am a lawyer."

"Yes; I came to you for counsel."

"I shall have to cross-question you."

"Yes; I am willing to answer all questions."

"What is the lady's name?"

"Mrs. Julia Gettenbergh."

"Where did you meet her?"

"She was one of my parishoners in L——. In fact I boarded with her a few months."

"A boarding house belle, eh?"

"She kept a very few select boarders. She was a thoroughly well-bred woman, I assure you. She never thought of being a belle."

"Were you acquainted with her husband?"

"No; never saw him. He was not at home. None of us ever spoke to her of him. We recognized a silence on her own part, and respected it."

"Is she aware of your sentiments?"

"O, no! I left the house and went elsewhere just as as soon as I discovered them."

"Is she good-looking?"

"Very. Here is one of my wrong acts. I have kept her photograph. It is, no doubt, one of the temptations of Satan, but I could not resist keeping this small memento."

He then took an old-fashioned locket from the pocket of his vest, and springing it open passed it over to me. He had cut down the photograph and inserted it.

"Why, she is decidedly plain."

"How can you say that!" he asked, firing up in her defense. "Did you ever see such eyes!"

"I admitted their rare thoughtfulness, and remarked upon other good points.

"Now, tell me the whole story," I said.

"As I told you, I had rooms at her cottage with a very few others. While there I was taken down with fever. That I recovered at all was due more to her superintending care than to either doctor or nurse. During convalescence, knowing my delight in books, she read a great deal aloud to me. How I used to long for the hours to come when, her morning duties done, she would bring her book and take her place beside me. At last it seemed to me that it was only day when she was near me, night during her absence."

"And did you ever tell her this fact?"

"Tell her! of course not" he said, with quick indignation.

"I fail to see, then, my good fellow, where in you have committed your great wrong. The wrong of loving is not in the emotion, but its acknowledgment, where that acknowledgment would harm another."

"But wait till I tell you all. As you know after a fever one becomes ravenous with hunger. The nurse would have permitted me to die of starvation or of slops in the shape of gruels and teas, but this perfect woman prepared with her own hand delicacies that would have satisfied an epicure, and it was during one of those occasions that my gratitude took form. I, I kissed the hand that offered me the tempting dish!"

"You copied the example of the illustrious Swiveler, and kissed her rosy finger between each mouthful!"

"No, oh no; only once did I commit that indiscretion, but like a loyal wife she withdrew after this from bestowing those attentions, nor could I blame her. I was the sole wrong-doer. When I was able to be removed I felt it to be my duty to go elsewhere. My sister came, and together we set up housekeeping in a small way, but, John, I can not tear her image from my heart. If she is not in her pew in church I do not care to preach to others. I embrace every opportunity of seeing her when she is not aware of it, and I am so much under the dominion of her charms that I think of leaving the ministry."

"Not leaving the ministry?"

"Yes, John. How can I minister to others with this secret on my soul? Have you no place for me in your office, John? I could write for you at least——"

"O, I see; you wish to study the laws of divorce. Is that it?"

I was sorry the moment I had said it. The dear fellow turned such a helpless look upon me that I drew up closer to him. Now, my dear friend, I said, let me be a physician and make a diagnosis of your case. Your disease is not of a cardiac nature. You have done no wrong. Your sensitive temperament magnified every thing; you might call it an affection of the stomach. She ministered to your needs, but now that there are no needs of that kind——

"O, John, you do not know any thing about it! Rather than lose the possession of this love, I would lose my hope of Heaven. Even though I know it can not be returned, it is precious to me—most precious; how can I explain to you, or make you understand that I must leave the ministry?"

"Let me prescribe for you. My wife and I are preparing to go to Europe. Go with us, Hardy. When you come back we will talk about the clerk business—in fact I promise you a partnership if you are not cured of your malady in six months."

He thanked me, and said he would consider it. That might be a good way, he said, to make the transition. Promising to see me again he took his leave.

Full of his story I went with it to my wife and told her what I had done. She is one of the few women who never question, but give a man his own way, and enter heart soul into his schemes even if they are foolish ones.

As I mentioned the name of the lady my wife sprang from her chair and faced me, her face glowing.

"John!"

"Yes."

"Do you remember Julia Armstrong?"

"Yes."

"She married a Gettenbergh."

"Did she?"

"Yes, and he lost his life——"

"Good!"

"You horrid John! he lost his life on a whaling ship, and she did not know for years that she was a widow. When she did, what did she do? She did not live on any of her wealthy relations, but went to work and kept a select boarding house in L——"

"The very place."

"And she does not tell anybody about her former life, partly from a natural reserve, partly because she doesn't want any body's pity, and so they think her a grass widow, and she takes no pains to undeceive them. And I am going to see her now."

"Good!"

"I would not wonder, but we could bring things all out right for them. I want to ask just one favor of you. Let me invite her to go abroad with us, too."

"Certainly."

"Now, I can manage it if she can for him, and if she does not, she shall, I will bring it about I warrant."

True to her purpose on visiting her old friend, my wife led the conversation to Rev. Hardy, and found that Mrs. Gettenbergh was laboring under a total misapprehension of the cause of his departure from her notable house.

"I liked him much," she said, quite frankly, "and was surprised and grieved that he should go away so abruptly. There is a certain restraint over us wherever we meet, which I can not account for, but I often think it is because he learned from some one, that I had deceived him regarding my relations. I meant no harm," she said, with a sudden burst of tears, "but he is so honest and above board himself that he might not excuse my silence about such an event. I have so wished to explain it to him, but he never gives me the slightest opportunity."

My wife's offer was then made to her, and with a great gladness she accepted it, not knowing who were to be her fellow voyagers, but because of her love for my wife and her desire to have the benefit of this rest and change.

The days passed by swiftly. Mrs. Gettenbergh was ready before the appointed time, and my wife put to her this test. She told her, in a matter of course way, the day before we sailed, that Mr. Hardy was to be a fellow voyager.

"In fact he is, I believe, an old college chum of my husband's."

She looked distressed.

"I thought it best to tell you at once," said my wife, "but of course, it can make no difference to you."

"Not unless he cares. I should be sorry if I spoiled his pleasure," she said nervously."

"A fig for his pleasure," said my wife. "We will let nothing spoil ours."

But I had not dared to reveal to him my treachery. He did not see her until we were out several days. Perhaps she purposely avoided him. But one morning she sat on deck with my wife. He was sauntering along in one of his meditative moods past the groups of people, when, stopping, "Good morning" to my wife, his eyes fell upon her companion, who arose with some timidity to greet him.

It was a hard ordeal, but he displayed remarkable self-possession. I felt proud of him.

Had she not been greatly pre-occupied she would have seen his more than common interest in her, but hers was one of those charmingly unselfish natures that never suppose the elements of attractiveness to to be inherent in themselves. After a very short conversation he disappeared. I found him a few moments afterward below, whither I had followed him.

"How could you do this, John?"

"Do what?"

"Why, bring us together again after I had almost fought it out of my heart. The battle has all to be fought over again. I found that my first thought was positive and unbounded delight for two weeks of unavoidable companionship, but how is life to be made endurable after that?"

I told him then that she turned out to be an old friend of my wife's, and was traveling in our company.

"Then that accounts for her speaking to me at all," he groaned. "I had observed long ago that she tried to avoid me, but here I am forced upon her against her will." He said this bitterly, turning a little away from me.

"See here, Hardy, I said, taking him by the shoulders and turning him fair about, "begging your ministerial pardon, you are too innocent to live. Why can you not——"

Horror-struck, he turned upon me without giving me time to finish my sentence.

"Do you forget my duty, and her own to her husband?" he asked, angrily.

"Did you ever see her husband?" I asked, meekly.

"No; but what difference does that make! Should I be less true to my brother whom I have not seen than to him whom I have seen?"

"Who ever told you that she possessed that appendage called a husband?"

He looked into my eyes, and his own began to dilate.

"They said——"

"Who said?" The idea had never entered his monk's cowl to question the truth of "They said."

I had the pleasure of telling him then her history from beginning to end, and of watching the changes that flitted over his expressive face, and when I ended my story by the words: "And Julius, it is my belief that she loves you," what did the dear boy do but fall on his knees then and there, dragging me perforce, along with him, and —"Thank the Lord." I never felt quite so near Heaven in my life before.

"Now, see here old fellow," I said, though the tears were in my eyes as we arose, "You are all wrong. You have thanked the wrong party. You ought to have thanked me!"

"Our lives are in His hand," he said, with solemn gladness; but nevertheless he threw an arm about my neck and gave me a brother's embrace.

There was a wedding in Liverpool, a delightful summer of travel, a winter of pleasant interchange of visits; and now, Dick, I invite you, on my good wife's motion, to dine with us to-morrow and meet an old friend of college days—a transformed man.

FRESH FASHION NOTES.

Spicy Paragraphs Concerning the Latest Vagaries in Feminine Dress.

The bustle is moribund.

Iron gray is very fashionable.

Hats are bewilderingly varied.

Stripe grow in fashion and favor.

Lace trims or covers all dressy parasols.

Fashionable men are discarding pointed shoes.

Suede gloves remain the correct wear for all occasions.

Next fall we will have no more big or even little bustles.

The large silk dust cloak is the rage in Paris at the moment.

The coat sleeve has disappeared from all children's garments.

Buttons are coming into favor for all sorts of dress decorations.

The small poke is the bonnet of the day, the hour and the season.

Gold-colored tulles for neckwear is much favored, and it is very becoming.

Never were ribbons so much utilized in dress decorations as at present.

Big and little buttons are both seen on the same costume, gown or garment.

White neck lingerie is not yet revived, but we are promised that it shall be.

The sleeves of men's dress coats are made larger, particularly above the elbow.

Full sleeves and short waists go together, and both are rapidly coming into vogue.

The popular colors for gloves are tan, eucalyptus brown, and gray in many shades.

Men's cravats are growing more fluffy and swear-at-you in effect. But the colors are quiet.

Short-waisted gowns are worn in the street by ladies in Paris and Berlin, but not yet in New York.

Pretty hats for young girls and children have low crowns and brims raised sharply at the back.

The new Marseilles blue is to take the place of navy blue for summer gowns of linen, serge and flannel.

There is a new blue, and it takes the name of Marseilles, as it is the shade of blue seen in the Marseilles soap.

The waistcoats of men are more dressy and obtrusive this season. The collar rolls further back and shows more of the shirt front.

Tea gowns are so costly, elegant and shapely now that many ladies wear them for dinners at home and everyday or informal receptions.

From Paris comes the information that both short and long waists are worn, but more short than long ones are seen on fashionable women.

French and English children do not wear the Greenaway dresses. These pretty quaint styles are the exclusive property of the American little girl.

The parasol with a natural stick, a bronze handle, unequal divisions on gores, lace trimmed and ribbon decorated, is the fancy of the passing hour.

Even when long waists are worn on the other side they are coiled around the waist with a long, wide sash, which gives both the short and long waisted effect.

A number of Fifth avenue society girls have anticipated Dame Fashion and discarded bustles. They look very queer, quaint and curious as they walk the avenue.

To embroider fine damask table linen with colored and gold thread in light darning stitches will be the favorite piazza occupation of ladies at summer resorts this season.

It is the fancy of the season to put loose dresses with short waists and half long sleeves on big girls. The Greenaway styles remain in highest favor for little girls.

The latest fancy in parasols is to have the sections of the cover unequally divided; that is to say, one narrow and one wide gore, and then the handle must be a natural wood stick.

The best Paris dressmakers send out dresses with plain skirts and no steels, fashioned to wear over neither bustles nor cushions; so that ladies who rebel against these styles are compelled to wear them or make their own gowns.

The long, full skirt peasant cape set on to a close yoke, sleeveless and with no armholes, made of light weight mohair serge or surah, pongee or bengaline, is the correct wear for a dust cloak. It may be black, gray, brown, ecru, barred or plaided, as the wearer prefers, but the hat must match it.

Dark green velveteen, with handsome heavy bronze braid designs for cuffs, collar, V plastrons on the waist and vandykes at the foot of the front breadth, makes an exquisite walking gown, traveling or excursion costume or coaching dress. The hat or bonnet can be changed ad libitum with such a gown.

Jersey waists are again in the ascendant and the jersey of the present season is a most elaborate and artistic affair, with gigot, Bishop, and Henri II. sleeves, smocked in at the armhole, and gauged to a fancy braided long cuff at the elbow, enriched with V plastrons in metal or fancy braid patterns, given a chemisette or guimpe in contrasting color and made gay with fancy buttons.

High plants and pyramids of flowers are no longer used as dinner table decorations, but in front of each lady's plate a crystal tray or plate is placed, on which is arranged a fan of flowers tied with ribbons to match. Similar objects are placed on the corners of square tables, and when lit up at night these flowers, with the cut glass and crystal and fine Dresden or Sevres China and silver, give the table a fairy-like appearance.—*N. SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.

—It is stated that at least 1,000,000 tons of commercial fertilizers are now annually used in this country.

—A few years ago cottonseed were thrown away as worthless, but to-day the seed is as valuable as the lint.

—M. Dubus Bonnet, of Lille, France, has invented a process of spinning and weaving glass into cloth. The warp is composed of silk, on which the pattern in glass appears.

—If gelatine be suspended in ordinary alcohol it will absorb the water, but as it is insoluble in alcohol that substance will remain behind, and thus nearly absolute alcohol may be obtained without distillation.

—"Securite" is the name given to a new explosive which is said to be flameless when exploded, and will, it is expected, be of especial value as a substitute for ordinary blasting powder and other explosives in fiery coal mines.

—An electro-magnet with a carrying capacity of 800 pounds is attached to a crane in the Cleveland Steel Works, which readily picks up billets and other masses of iron without the aid of any other device. A boy is thus enabled to do the work of a dozen men.

—By the old method the steel wire from which watch springs are made was heated to the proper temperature and immediately plunged into oil. In the new process the wire is immersed in the oil bath first, and is then brought, by means of an electric current, to the desired degree of heat.

—Prof. Roberts, of Cornell, urges the importance of a complex diet for a man, and especially the use of concentrated products, such as beef, milk, butter and cheese. Only on such food is it possible to reach the fullest perfection of physical health and intellectual development.

—One New York factory turns out five millions of matches every working day. The cutting of splints from pine planks is done so rapidly that about thirty-six planks, each twelve feet long, eleven inches wide and three inches thick, can be cut up into splints during the course of the day.

—It is known that very elastic caoutchouc tubing gradually loses some of its elasticity; later, the tubes break on stretching, even if previously laid in warm water, and finally they crack if pressed between the fingers. This change is put down to a very slow formation of sulphuric acid by the action of moist air on the sulphur contained in the caoutchouc. By frequent washing with slightly alkaline water the action of the acid is prevented; tubes washed five or six times a year remaining perfectly elastic.

—Fire under water can be produced by placing a small piece of phosphorous in a conically shaped glass filled with water, and some crystals of chloride of potash covering the phosphorous, and then pouring through a long tube funnel, or a glass tube, a few drops of sulphuric acid down on the mixture at the bottom of the glass. Tongues of flame can be seen flashing up through the water. The intense chemical action produces sufficient heat to flame the phosphorous under the water. Where there is sufficient heat and oxygen fire will burn, whether in air or water.

—Grape juice is now pressed into bottles, and then olive oil is poured in at the top of each bottle. This effectually excludes the air, and none can work down into the wine to ferment it. At the same time any air that was in the juice finds its way up through the oil. The oil is sopped up with cotton when the bottle is uncorked. The cotton absorbs it little by little. All that is needed is a little patience. This art of keeping unfermented wine was practiced by the Egyptians many years before Christ. But it was lost. It has now been rediscovered, and is coming into general use.

OLD NURSERY TALES.

The Antiquity of the Fairy Stories Told to Our Children.

"Little Red Riding-hood," being generally supposed to be the story of the Dawn, or of the spring, first swallowed and then rescued from the jaws of Night, or Winter, is to be met with in the mythology of the Greeks, the old Australians and the Scandinavians.

"Blue Beard" is a well traveled villain. He has been in Zululand, Russia, Persia, Germany, Italy, Scandinavia and elsewhere, wearing successfully the garb of each of his adopted homes. This story is curiously interwoven with the myths of Psyche, Semele, Pandora, and other examples of woman's curiosity; so that there seems no reason why we should not actually look for the beginnings of "Blue Beard" in the Garden of Eden itself.

Puss in Boots," so far as it is possible to trace him, appears to have set out on his travels from Zanzibar, in the form of a gazelle, to have passed through India as a jackal, to have visited Russia, Sicily and Mongolia as a fox, and at last, as a cat, to have roamed over Italy, Sweden and Norway, France and England. In some of these places the story, owing to an episode in which the hero is punished for ingratitude to his benefactor, has the advantage of moral, but in most of the old versions Puss's evil practices are undisguised, and, contrary to all the orthodox canons, he is left smiling at the end of the chapter.

"Cinderella," whose romance we are inclined to rank as the most enthralling of all the nursery tales, is scarcely less widely traveled than her companions. In Kaffirland she is known, disguised as a boy, with a friendly ox instead of a fairy godmother. In Finland, Servia and among the Gaelic Scotch we still have the protecting beast.—Manchester Courier.

DECEPTIVE SENSES.

Illusions of Bodily Motion Induced Through Visual Impressions.

The senses are subject to illusions in proportion to the remoteness of the information that they give from the immediate necessities of the organism. Touch, the most immediate and least inferential of the senses, is least subject to illusions; while sight is so very much so that the blind often say they have an advantage over the seeing in being free from visual illusions. The illusions of bodily motion are much nearer to those of touch than to those of sight, and yet they can under certain conditions be induced through visual impressions. Of this the writer has recently had two interesting examples. He was standing upon the floor of a railroad depot, the boards of which were laid with a considerable open space between them; and the shadow of an electric light was moving up and down, by the swinging of the light in the wind. Looking at the floor, it seemed as though the shadow was stationary, and the floor boards moving. From this it followed that the person on it was moving too, and the writer distinctly felt the swinging sensation; in fact, his attention was called to the phenomenon by this feeling of motion. The other observation was as follows: While riding in the cars and looking out of the window, the trees and all are seen to move in the opposite direction. If, now, one looks in a mirror so situated that it reflects the passing landscape, which, however, must not be visible except in the mirror, one has the illusion of moving in the opposite to the real direction of motion, owing to the reversal of the image in the glass. In both these cases an immediate bodily sensation is induced by a more or less unconscious inference through visual sensations.—American Analyst.

Wonderful Printing Machine.

The American Bookmaker describes a machine which takes in paper at one end and turns out completely bound books at the other at the rate of 5,000 copies an hour. There are three great iron cylinders, segmental in form and each having a diameter of six feet, and weighing about three tons each. On one of these are the forms which do the printing in quadruple series, the other two acting solely as impression cylinders. In combination with the cylinder carrying the printing forms are ink fountains, form and distributing rollers, while in combination with the impression cylinders are novel appliances for handling (automatically), revising, assembling, folding, covering and delivering the complete books. This remarkable contrivance requires eight tons of paper, with a corresponding amount of printing ink, and this it turns into books in a single day, and it requires twelve box-cars, of 30,000 pounds capacity each, to transfer the output for a single week. This machine is built in Philadelphia by its inventor and patentee, at whose establishment the visitor may see in daily and nightly operation no less than six of these mammoth machines turning with surprising rapidity and regularity their miles of paper into printed matter ready for the perusal of the reader.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—Seedtime and harvest are not promised to slothful farmers who stake all chances on the theory that the world owes them a living.

—If the brush is to be used it is of more importance on the cow than on the horse, yet the former is almost entirely neglected in that respect.

—Frost Pudding: One cupful of boiled rice, one pint of milk, butter the size of a walnut, yelks of three eggs, and the rind of one lemon. Bake, and add a meringue made of the whites of three eggs.

—Good clover hay, or a variety of grass in the pasture, will give better results than an exclusively grain diet to any kind of stock. It is the variety of food rather than the quality and quanity that promotes digestion and health.

—Excellent results are claimed for the dry method of feeding chickens, i. e., beginning with boiled egg and bread crumbs, changing this diet in a few days to oatmeal, fine cracked corn, fine cracked wheat, afterwards substituting whole grain.

—The farmer who says his business "does not pay," in most cases proclaims his own incapacity, for there is the plain fact that agriculture returns larger profits in this country than in any other land, no matter whether prices be high or low.

—Creamed Codfish: Boil one pint of milk, thicken it with one tablespoon of butter and one tablespoonful of flour; mix together in a bowl set on top of the boiling tea-kettle, stirring occasionally as the butter melts, until they are smoothly blended; season with pepper and add a heaping cup of shredded codfish. Serve hot.

—The restorative influence of plowing in clover on run-down land is not wholly due to the plant food it furnishes to the soil, which produces increased growth of crops, but is largely due to the mechanical effect in mellowing and fining a soil that by long cultivation has become compacted and lifeless.—Country Gentleman.

—To make good waffles, take one pint of buttermilk, one teaspoonful of soda, one tablespoonful of melted butter, one teacup of flour, the yelk of four eggs, and a small pinch of salt; beat the whites separately to a stiff froth, and add them the last thing. Have the waffle tins well greased and very hot, pour in the batter and bake brown.

—In transplanting cabbage, tomato, pepper, or other plants, have the soil well prepared; take a shallow pan, partially filled with water and good, rich soil, stirring until the consistency of cream; take up the plants carefully, and dip the roots so that as much soil as possible will adhere to them. In setting out see that the earth is packed firmly around the roots.—Home, Farm and Factory.

—Bread Balls for Soup: Cut the crumb of a stale loaf into small pieces, put them in a basin and pour over them enough hot water to moisten, without making them too wet, let them cool; chop an onion, lay it in the frying pan with a large lump of dripping and some chopped parsley, and fry a light brown; mix it with the bread, and when cool add two well-beaten eggs, salt, pepper and sufficient flour to bind; make the mixture into small balls and drop them into the boiling soup about fifteen minutes before serving.

—Potato Turnovers: Mash some dry, mealy potatoes while they are warm; add a piece of butter, and mix with them two or three beaten eggs, according to the quantity of potatoes. Dredge a paste board, spread on it the potatoes a good half-inch thick. When cool, cut out in squares or round cakes five inches across. Put on each a large tablespoonful of any remnants of meat or poultry minced fine. Turn over half of the cake to cover it, coat them over with egg and bread-crumbs, and bake a delicate brown in a moderate oven.

VALUE OF DRAINAGE.

Why It Pays to Drain Dry Land Under All Circumstances.

The past two years of drought, and the pretense of some unwise writers that the drought was caused by the tile drainage, has greatly demoralized the business. It will take some time to recover. But it will again resume its place in good farm improvements. It is a benefit to the farm in any kind of a season, too wet, too dry, or medium. It prepares the soil to stand better the extremes of the seasons. Plants mostly get their moisture from the ground, and it is better brought up by capillary attraction when the soil is rendered loose and porous by underground tile drainage. And underdrains are ten times better than open ditches to take the surplus water off. When the water passes through the soil to the drain, there is no loss of fertilizing material by washing, and the ground will be found ready for tillage in a few hours after the heaviest rains. In case of tile drainage the soil will catch up and retain for plant food all that the fall of snow or rain always brings to the earth. The tile drain three feet deep and twenty feet apart, with a fall of two inches to the one hundred feet, will work wonders in nearly all classes of land. This is not necessarily confined to land too wet for cultivation. It pays to drain dry land, so that the water will pass through and enrich the soil instead of taking off by surface water the fertilizing gases brought down by rain from the atmosphere, as well as the artificial fertilizers applied by the provident farmer. Let no variety of reasons stop the grand work of drainage, and never listen to the foolish man who charges drought to such work. —Des Moines (Ia.) Register.

BOUND TO SUCCEED.

The Story of the Bootblack Who Was N to Be Kept Down.

"It's just about seven years ago," said a well-known broker, as he pointed toward a well-dressed young man, "since that young fellow shined my shoes, and I believe that it was the last pair he ever got paid for putting a gloss on.

"At that time Billie was one of the many youngsters who made their livelihood by keeping an electric shining chair in gambler's alley. In those days the highway was frequented by a good many young sports who didn't care any more about paying a quarter for a shine than they did about treating a friend to ice water. This young fellow scraped the sand from my shoes that afternoon and daubed them with a half inch layer of blacking—more or less—and as he finished he said, "I wish I could give up shining." This was something strange to come from him, for he was an expert shiner and got a good deal more than his share of patronage, and the other professors of the brush were envious. I got over my surprise, for I thought that two regiments of soldiers couldn't drive him away from that chair, and I asked him why he wanted to give up the old stand. As he toiled away with his two brushes he said: 'Well, if I don't quit it soon I never will get out of it. So I want to get away from it while I feel like it. And if I don't before long it will be the ball and chain on my leg all the days of my life.'

"I had pity on the poor fellow, for he talked so sincerely, and, while he was giving my coat a finishing touch with his whisk broom, a friend of mine, who was engaged in the lumber business at that time, came up.

"As soon as Billie saw him he gave me a wink that said: 'See if he won't do something for a fellow who wants to better his condition.' My friend took the vacant chair next to me, and after we had chatted awhile I asked him if he couldn't give Billie a job. He was soon as much interested in the bootblack as I was myself, and after hearing a long talk Billie was engaged as a yard hustler at six dollars a week—just about one-third what he was making at shining. He had little chance to obtain an education, but this didn't discourage him, and half of the first week's pay was spent for school-books. Every spare moment that the lad had he spent in study, and he could be seen quite often between two lumber piles figuring out an example in long division with a pencil on a smooth board.

After he had been doing general work about the yard for about four months he was promoted to the position of tallyman, which he held until the end of 1881. Bill had been very diligent during all this time, and I determined to see if I couldn't get him a more remunerative position, and one where he could advance himself faster than in the lumber business. Accordingly I sent a letter to one of my correspondents, a reputable Wall street broker, and the reply was that he wanted a good office man, and if I had a friend he would be very glad to give him the place.

"I kept Bill in my office until a few days before he was to take his New York position. Then he went East. He gave excellent satisfaction in every respect, and gradually made himself so valuable that he became, in time, a partner. He withdrew from the firm last January and brought over $100,000 to Chicago with him as his share.

"He thinks the first step he made toward success was when he started off with a load of 'two-by-fours' on his shoulder in a lumber yard not a great distance from the corner of Lincoln street and Blue Island avenue."—Chicago Mail.

WITHOUT A NAME.

The Queer Inscription on a Southern War Waif's Tombstone.

"It happened this way," continued Plunkett. "There never was but one locomotive made in Georgia up to the time that one was made in Atlanta during the war. They needed engines mighty bad then, and they went to work in the shops at Atlanta and turned out as good er looking little locomotive as I ever seed, and they named it 'Sunshine,' and the railroad men took on over it er heap, and every engineer wanted it for his.

"Things was hustling outen Atlanta, for old Sherman was doing some of his swinging erround, and it was feared he'd get the control of the Macon & Western then, and this little engine was erbout to be shut off, so the engineer he fired up and folks piled onto it and out she started for Macon. She was er sailing erlong as fast as ever an engine run them days when, before you could wink your eye, she busted. That was the last of 'Sunshine,' and it was the last of er heap of folks, but it was war times and fifteen or twenty folks killed wasn't noticed worth talking erbout, but in the wreck among the dead and wounded was found a little baby that nobody has ever claimed, and the little thing was not scratched by the wreck, but just set there in er little place and laughed and crowed 'Mam, mam, mam,' and we knowed by that it was the little child of some poor refugeeing woman. They took good care of the little thing, and it lived eight months after that, and the strange thing is that it never heard an engine nor seed er car but what it would say them same words over, 'Mam, mam, mam.' But it's over yonder, with 'Child Without a Name' on its tombstone, and that ends it in this world, but it teaches the lesson that war's er bad, bad thing."—Atlanta Constitution.

BOYS ON THE FARM.

The Advisability of Providing Them With a Set of Tools.

Let me give a few hints to farmers about providing tools for the boys; I mean carpenter tools, such as good hand-saws, that can be bought for $1.50 to $2 in the hardware stores, a hatchet, square, chisels, brace and bits, two or three planes and a bench to use them on, nails and spikes of different kinds and sizes. Then set the boys at using them. Let them begin on something that needs repairing in or about the house, barn or yard fence, which an inexperienced hand can do. A boy will take to working with tools and tinkering as readily as a duck will take to water. Provide them with plenty of nails; they will break and waste some at first, no doubt, but if they do, the loss is not very great, for nails are cheap. Do not expect them to be perfect in the art of driving nails, for it takes an expert to hit a nail square on the head every time. Any boy can hit a nail, but it very often happens to be a finger-nail. They also want a good hatchet, but no old thing with the face chipped off. Give a boy a chance and he will soon learn how to handle tools, and will save quite a snug little sum every year that would be paid out to carpenters for repairing gates, doors, windows, etc.. It will pay a larger dividend than to allow them to sit around the house and torment the organ or an old fiddle! I know men, middle-aged men, that did not have the use of such tools when they were boys, who can not build a a decent-looking chicken coop, or pig-pen. And I have seen other men that could not saw off a board and saw it off straight when marked by a square. And I have actually seen farmers trying to do some kinds of carpenter work with the mattock and spade, and the work was done accordingly! Take my advice, brother farmers, and see the boys enjoy themselves and be yourselves happy.—John W. Klingler, in Ohio Farmer.

THE CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Which Opens in Cincinnati July 4.

No event of the past decade has created as much interest in the whole country as the coming of the Centennial Exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, which opens its doors in Cincinnati on the nation's birthday (July 4), to continue for one hundred days and nights—a celebration in honor of the one hundredth anniversary of the settlement of the Northwest Territory. Unlimited means have been placed at the disposal of the managers by the enterprising business element of the Queen City, and nothing is being left undone that will conduce to the success of the undertaking. Instead of a local—as some suppose—it is a National event, made so by the hearty co-operation on the part of a dozen of the chief States in the Union, and the encouragement given it by the fact that "Uncle Sam" intends to make an exhibit of his own of the treasures stored away in Washington City —an appropriation for the moving and care of which has been recommended by a Congressional Committee to whom the matter was referred.

The guarantee fund of one million and fifty thousand dollars, which the Board of Commissioners have at their command, has enabled them to provide magnificent quarters in which to display the mass of articles already offered, and these, in conjunction with the permanent building in which numerous Expositions on a smaller scale have been held, and which cost over one million dollars, will give to this affair better facilities than were ever enjoyed by any thing of the kind ever held in this country, not excepting the famous Exposition in Philadelphia in 1876. The area of exhibiting space will be about 700,000 square feet. The temporary buildings, when ready for occupancy, will have cost no less than a quarter of a million of dollars, and are models of architecture, combining all the elements necessary for the uses to which they will be put.

The Exposition has been advertised for the past year in a masterly manner, and there is nosection of the country that has failed to hear of the great event. Applications for exhibiting space have been received in abundance from every clime, and there seems to be no reason to doubt its entire success, both artistically and financially.

Spring poets should be pitied rather than berated; "mercury" and "thermometer" are two of the hardest words in the English language to find rhymes for.

WHAT AILS YOU?

Do you feel dull, languid, low-spirited, lifeless, and indescribably miserable, both physically and mentally; experience a sense of fullness or bloating after eating, or of "goneness," or emptiness of stomach in the morning, tongue coated, bitter or bad taste in mouth, irregular appetite, dizziness, frequent headaches, blurred eyesight, "floating specks" before the eyes, nervous prostration or exhaustion, irritability of temper, hot flushes, alternating with chilly sensations, sharp, biting, transient pains here and there, cold feet, drowsiness after meals, wakefulness, or disturbed and unrefreshing sleep, constant, indescribable feeling of dread, or of impending calamity?

If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from that most common of American maladies—Bilious Dyspepsia, or Torpid Liver, associated with Dyspepsia, or Indigestion. The more complicated your disease has become, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. No matter what stage it has reached, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will subdue it, if taken according to directions for a reasonable length of time. If not cured, complications multiply and Consumption of the Lungs, Skin Diseases, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Kidney Disease, or other grave maladies are quite liable to set in and, sooner or later, induce a fatal termination.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery acts powerfully upon the Liver, and through that great blood-purifying organ, cleanses the system of all blood-taints and impurities, from whatever cause arising. It is equally efficacious in acting upon the Kidneys, and other excretory organs, cleansing, strengthening, and healing their diseases. As an appetizing, restorative tonic, it promotes digestion and nutrition, thereby building up both flesh and strength. In malarial districts, this wonderful medicine has gained great celebrity in curing Fever and Ague, Chills and Fever, Dumb Ague, and kindred diseases.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery

Salt-rheum, "Fever-sores," Scaly or Rough Skin, in short, all diseases caused by bad blood are conquered by this powerful, purifying, and invigorating medicine. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence. Especially has it manifested its potency in curing Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Scrofulous Sores and Swellings, Hip-joint Disease, "White Swellings," Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands. CONSUMPTION, which is Scrofula of the Lungs, is arrested and cured by this remedy, if taken in the earlier stages of the disease. From its marvelous power over this terribly fatal disease, when first offering this now world-famed remedy to the public, Dr. Pierce thought seriously of calling it his "CONSUMPTION CURE," but abandoned that name as too restrictive for a medicine which, from its wonderful combination of tonic, or strengthening, alterative, or blood-cleansing, anti-bilious, pectoral, and nutritive properties, is unequaled, not only as a remedy for Consumption, but for all Chronic Diseases of the Liver, Blood, and Lungs.

For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Shortness of Breath, Chronic Nasal Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, Severe Coughs, and kindred affections, it is an efficient remedy.

Cleveland Nominated.

The Democratic National Nominating Convention at St. Louis nominated Cleveland for President Wednesday afternoon by acclamation. His name was placed before the convention by Daniel Dougherty, of New York. No nomination for Vice President was made Wednesday.

The national prohibition convention at Indianapolis Thursday of last week, nominated Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, of New Jersey, for President, and Rev. John A. Brooks for Vice-President. It also adopted a platform containing a woman suffrage plank.

The Wilmington, (Del.) election Saturday resulted in the election of Austin Harrington, Republican, for mayor by over 700 majority. The Democrats elected seven members of the city councils and the Republicans five. The Republican majority for the head of the ticket was caused by disaffection in the Democratic ranks.

The Baltimore Herald's Rockville correspondent, speaking of the Republican Sixth District Congressional nomination, says: "A prominent Republican of Montgomery county, and who is well informed in political circles, says Louis E. McComas will be nominated again beyond a doubt for the fourth time and will carry the district by a larger majority than he has heretofore."

At the meeting at Pittsburgh Saturday night of the Trades Assembly of Western Pennsylvania, representing 60,000 organized workmen, resolutions were unanimously adopted condemning the Mills bill and all its advocates, and condemning Congressman Scott, of Erie, as an enemy of labor, a dangerous person to the welfare of society and the industrial progress of America, and as a bitter enemy of organized labor.

Elections were held throughout Illinois Monday for Judges of the Supreme Court. The returns show that the Republican candidates, David J. Baker, Jacob W. Wilkin, Joseph M. Bailey and Benjamin D. Magruder were elected in the first, third, sixth and seventh districts, and John H. Scolfield, a Democrat, the present incumbent, in the second district. This makes the Supreme Bench of Illinois Republican for the first time in its history.

The Democrats nominated candidates for Congress in the several districts of this State as follows:

First district—Charles H. Gibson, of Talbot county.

Second district—Herman Stump, of Harford county.

Third district—Harry Wells Rusk, of Baltimore city.

Fourth district—Isidor Raynor, of Baltimore city.

Fifth district—Barnes Compton, of Prince George's county.

Sixth district—H. Kyd Douglas, of Washington county.

Republicans Carry Oregon.

PORTLAND, OREGON, June 4.—An election was held in this State to-day for Representative in Congress, a Supreme Court Judge, and a Legislature that will name the successor of U. S. Senator Dolph. Chief interest centered in the legislative contest.

The Republicans confidently claim the election of Herman, Republican, for Congress, by not less than 1,500 majority. The Legislature is claimed by the Republicans on joint ballot.

LATER.

PORTLAND, OREGON, June 5.—Late returns indicate Herman's, (Republican) for Congress, election by 4,000 majority. Both houses of the Legislature will be Republican, standing on joint ballot, Republicans 66, Democrats about 24. Another report says: Returns from all parts of the State accessible by telegraph indicate that Herman (Republican) for Congress, has 4,000 majority. His majority in Multnomah county, which includes Portland, is 2,500. The Prohibition vote was very small. The Republicans made gains in every county in the State.

The Democracy at St. Louis.

Democracy as focused at St. Louis is certainly a queer compound. First we have the delegations, clubs and camp-followers shouting themselves hoarse and stripping the city of bandanas to honor one whom Cleveland four years ago officially turned out to grass, and whom the Democrats in his own state have ostracised for denouncing fraud at the ballot-box and corruption in a Democratic legislature. Thurman in 1884 was too aged to aid in instilling the highly moral civil service sentiments of the President, but by some special feat of political legerdemain he is sufficiently rejuvenated to run on the same ticket with him now that Cleveland has renounced the arduous task of reforming the country. Seldom have such rapid changes been witnessed outside of a pantomine.

But this is not the only protean wonder promised the people. The Mills bill, the President's pride, and but recently the shibboleth of Democratic faith, upon which the majority in Congress has spent the whole of a long session, is as dead as a rat. The friends of the President's late mouthpieces and tariff-reformer-in ordinary to the White House, have appealed in vain for a hearing for this economic prodigy. There are "none so poor to do it reverence." It has died in the bornin'! There may be sharp fighting over the resolutions—the composition of the committee, so far as foreshadowed, promises this—but the Mills bill is beyond resurrection or redemption. The free-traders are in force at St. Louis, and their best men will probably be on the platform committee—such representative Democrats as Watterson and Morrison—but they will be heavily handicapped. Senator Gorman, however, will be at the head of it, and can be depended upon to reduce their fiery and impetuous proposals to a condition of innocuous desuetude.

Constitutional timidity is rapidly taking the place of the boastful attitude which the party maintained a few days ago, and the threats of upturning the business enterprises of the country will be carefully laid away in the political lumber-closet until after the election. The platform of 1884, which disclosed nothing tangible under the powerful lens of Mr. Weller's double-million magnifying microscope, is to be trotted out again, with the solemnity by which Democrats so well manage to shroud a periodical joke, and a generalization from Mr. Cleveland's discredited message is to be tacked on to supply standing-room for the bewildered statesmen who vainly imagined they were on the eve of a Democratic millenium.

But there is one man at the Capitol attending to his congressional duties, whose bosom must swell with pride as he reads the reports of these versatile prestidigitateurs in St. Louis who have so recently tried to read him out of the party. Mr. Samuel J. Randall's day has probably come at last. He is the shrewdest old Roman of them all. He knew he had but to watch and wait, and that his immature colleagues and their callow leader after strange gods would be sure to come in out of the shower. Mr. Mills will probably be more respectful in his demeanor to this old-time war-horse after the convention adjourns, and the other Democratic members of Congress who have been chastened and subdued by their visit to St. Louis will be glad to shake him by the hand and acknowledge their folly. But the surplus remains and is piling up in the treasury, and the people are looking askance at this parody on government.—Baltimore American.

Political Pointers.

WASHINGTON, June 3.—The job of concentrating on a Republican candidate is not an easy case. The Blaine delegates were elected without any reference to their second choice, and his retirement from the field has developed a chance of conflicting preference. The Western delegates could be pretty generally united on Gresham, but Mr. Platt and his New York people object strenuously to that. If they must have a Western man they prefer Harrison or Alger. Every day that passes adds to the difficulty; for every day each candidate in the field picks up a delegate or two. Sherman, by the sheer force of the law that the largest body has the greatest attractive power, should make much the largest gains, but many of his delegates are held to him by pledges rather than enthusiasm, and his boom has not gained by Blaine's withdrawal to the extent to which might fairly be expected. The nomination of Thurman on the Democratic ticket would strengthen Sherman's chances if anybody supposed for a moment that even Thurman's nomination would make Ohio doubtful.

Meanwhile a politician, who is neither a tenderfoot nor a fool, threw out this suggestion to me to-day: "The convention meets on Tuesday. If it doesn't nominate a candidate before Saturday, it will nominate before Sunday, and nominate Blaine."

NEW YORK, June 3.—Among the prominent dark horses talked of here among Republican politicians to-day Senator Cameron's name is frequently mentioned. Depew has great hold on people of New York. He is not a politician and has none of the leaders for him. Ex Senator Platt waited upon Depew when the New York reporters started his boom a couple of months ago and offered to engineer it. Mr. Depew laughed, as usual, and said: "I am not a candidate. Mr. Blaine is my choice." Platt took him at his word, or else felt snubbed, and is now working against him in the interest of William Walter Phelps. Hiscock is for himself, and Senator Miller is for Sherman in a dreamy sort of way. They are all delegates-at-large. Murat Halstead is here in the interest of Sherman. He thinks the friends of Gresham have been a little previous and have hurt their candidate's chances by aggressiveness. Ex-Congressman Horr, of Michigan, came on last week and is looking after Alger's fences. He thinks Alger and Levi P. Morton would pull well together, but politicians think this united barrels might be an objection. There is to be a quiet caucus of leaders here toward the last of the week.

Mr. Halstead, in answer to a general question about the Republican Presidential nomination, says:

"I do not see how the convention can reasonably avoid nominating Senator Sherman. He has more than the famous 306 of Grant now. The persistent retirement of Mr. Blaine has given a large number of delegates personal liberty in an unusual degree in this Convention, and it has established toward Sherman a drift of scattering votes in New England and the South, and given him a great deal of power in Pennsylvania. If anybody is going to beat that, they must show something stronger. It is simply a question of whether on that basis Sherman is to go on to the nomination or some one else be pushed forward from a minor position of strength. As to Senator Sherman's record, it is the record of the Republican party. The principles of the Republican party have their embodiment in him. There is no special reason for rank enthusiasm."

A Copious and Versatile Malefactor.

New York Tribune.

The growth of the Prohibition third party movement is seriously attributed to Mr. Blaine by a leading exponent of Mugwumpery. Of course. The Mugwump catechism contains these questions and answers:

Q.—Who brought death into the world and all mortal woe?

A.—James G. Blaine.

Q.—How can that be, since he was not born until after the fell deed was done?

A.—Well, anyhow, he would have done it if he had gotten a chance.

Q.—Can you criminally connect him with the deluge?

A.—We can. The Evening Post has got an affidavit in its office-safe setting forth that Noah always laid the blame on James G. Blaine.

Q.—What did Guy Fawkes remark when he was arrested?

A.—Mr. Fawkes, placing his hand on a pocket Testament, which he always carried about with him, exclaimed in tones that carried conviction to all that heard him: "My lords and gentlemen, I cannot tell a lie. James G. Blaine did it."

Q.—What do later researches show in regard to the massacre of the Huguenots?

A.—They show that without an exception every one of the unfortunate Huguenots in question perished by the gore-reddened hand of James G. Blaine.

Q.—Do you know what Dr. Kane always charged when the subject of Arctic voyage was broached?

A.—The Doctor always charged, with an earnestness all his own, that the reason the North Pole had never been discovered was owing solely to the shameful fact that it had been removed from its place and hidden away by James G. Blaine.

Q.—Who smote the marble gods of Greece?

A.—James G. Blaine. He committed the outrage on his way home from firing uninsured Ephesian dome.

Q.—What did the last Mayors of Pompeii and Herculaneum assert in their ante-mortem statements?

A.—They swore that neither Pompeii nor Herculaneum was destroyed by an eruption of Vesuvius, but that both cities were shovelled under by James G. Blaine. They thought they could identify the shovel.

Q.—Do you know what stands in the way of James G. Blaine being popular in the South?

A.—Yes. It is well-known by all the detectives of that section that James G. Blaine single-handed and alone put up the Charleston earthquake job, gave Memphis its worst attack of yellow fever, and endeavored to dry up the Gulf Stream so as permanently to injure the Southern climate.

Q.—Can you fix the date of his cold-blooded raid on the Gulf Stream?

A.—It was not long after he introduced the potato bug into Kansas.

* * * * * *

There is much more of this sort in the Mugwump catechism. No Mugwump, therefore, is going to be surprised at anything he may hear about James G. Blaine. Responsible for the growth of the third party movement, is he? Why, cert'nly.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, June 4, 1888.—Mr. Blaine is certainly out of the field now. Under no circumstances will he accept the nomination. This is his own decision, and doubtless it was arrived at after long, careful and calm consideration of the field and the coming important campaign in all its various bearings. That it was wholly in the interest of harmony in the Republican party cannot be doubted by anyone who has given the slightest thought to the subject. Mr. Blaine does not propose to sulk either, for he has already announced his intention of returning to this country in time to take the stump for the nominee of the Chicago convention, no matter who he may be. Mr. Blaine's nearest friends here, in talking of who the nominee is to be, seem to be practically unanimous in agreeing that the choice should be left to the delegates from the doubtful States, New York, New Jersey, Connecticut and Indiana; that those States which are certain to go Republican should support the choice of the doubtful States, particularly New York. This strikes me as good sensible advice, which if followed out, will surely result in a victory for the Republican party this year, and after all, that is more to be desired than the elevation of any one man. The success of the Republican party is necessary for the welfare of the country. Four years more of Democratic misrule will ruin the nation. Let every Republican bear this fact in mind, and there is no doubt of what the result will be.

The House spent three days last week in discussing the tariff bill under the five minute rule. It has now been laid aside until next Monday, owing to the St. Louis convention. When it is taken up again, if the progress is not greater than it was during the three days devoted to it, a vote on it will never be reached at the present session.

Strange as it may sound, it is nevertheless true, that there is absolutely no interest expressed here in the St. Louis convention, owing to the fact that everything had been all fixed up beforehand. About one fourth of the Democrats in Congress are in attendance, but they went more from force of habit than because of anything they expected to accomplish by going.

Legislation can sometimes be put through Congress in a very short time, as was proven by the bill reviving the grade of General of the Army, for the promotion of General Phil Sheridan. The bill was passed by the Senate Tuesday; was reported to the House Thursday, but went over on objection being made. Friday the bill was called up at 12:45 o'clock, was passed and received the approval of the President before 2, and at 2:45, just two hours from the sime it was called up in the House, General Sheridan had received his commissiod as General of the Army. The commission was taken to the residence of General Sheridan by Senators Hawley and Manderson. As Mrs. Sheridan met them, Senator Hawley handed her the commisson, remarking "Madame, I give you this with great pleasure." Mrs. Sheridan was much moved, and exclaimed: "I know now he will get well." She thanked the gentlemen with much earnestness and retiring said she would hand the commission to the General at once. No one was in the sick room when Mrs. Sheridan gave her husband the new commissien, except the doctor, the nurse even being out of the room at the time. He was much gratified and seemed to be happy. He immediately dictated an acceptance of the commission which he signed with a pencil in a large and legible hand.

The Democratic Senators are already heartily sick of the public debate on the Fisheries treaty. Only one Republican—Senator Frye—has spoken on it yet, but his speech was enough to show the Democratic Senators that they were entirely ignorant on this whole fisheries question, while the New England Senators have the whole thing at their finger's ends. The treaty will not be called up again until June 11, it having been postponed to that date at the request of the Democratic Senators who wanted to attend the Cleveland ratification meeting in St. Louis this week.

A serious charge has been brought against Mr. Fuller, the nominee for Chief Justice, by Mr. Dunlevy, of Chicago. It is charged that in 1881 Mr. Fuller and the clerk of the court were jury commissioners, and drew a jury to try a case in Which Mr. Fuller was heavily interested. The jury so drawn rendered a verdict which put many thousands of dollars in Mr. Fuller's pockets. The Senate Judiciary Committee are investigating the charge.

Order of Publication.

Maria Grove by her husband and next friend, William P. Grove, vs, Amanda Moore and John J. Moore, her husband.

No. 433 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree for a sale of certain mortgaged premises in Garrett county, which were mortgaged by the defendant, Amanda Moore, to William P. Grove, of whom the complainant is the assignee.

The bill states that on the 31st day of March, 1883, William P. Grove sold to Amanda Moore, wife of John J. Moore, a tract of land situate, lying and being in Garrett county, Maryland, at and for the sum of four thousand dollars, and on the same day executed and delivered a deed of conveyance for said land to the said Amanda Moore.

The bill further states that the said Amanda Moore on the 31st day of March, 1883, executed and delivered to the said William P. Grove, a mortgage on said land to secure the payment, on or before the 1st day of April, 1884, the sum of three hundred dollars, and also to secure ten annual payments according to the tenor of ten single bills in said mortgage mentioned, the same being for the balance of the purchase money for said land.

The bill further states that the said Amanda Moore, jointly with her husband, the said John J. Moore, executed and delivered to the said William P. Grove their ten joint and several single bills; two of said single bills have been paid, and the other eight remain unpaid; that on the 18th day of February, 1885, the said William P. Grove, for value received, assigned said mortgage, together with said notes to the said Maria Grove; that there appears a credit on one of said notes of two hundred and fifteen dollars, and there now remains of said purchase money, together with the interest thereon accrued unpaid and owing the sum of $2,908.83.

The bill further states that default has been made in the payment of said purchase money; that the said land was purchased by said Amanda Moore out of her separate estate and that the money paid on account of said purchase money was paid by the said Amanda Moore out of her separate estate.

The bill further states that the said Amanda Moore has been living separate and apart from her said husband, the said John J. Moore, and charges that the said John J. Moore never had an interest to any extent whatever in said property, and that he doth not reside in the State of Maryland.

The bill prays that said real estate may be sold for the payment of said mortgage debt and interest accrued, for such other and general relief as the nature of the case may require, and for process against the defendants.

It is thereupon ordered, by the Circuit Court for Garrett county in Equity, this 4th day of June, 1888, that the complainant cause a copy of this order, together with the object and substance of the bill, to be inserted in some newspaper published in Garrett county once a week for four successive weeks, before the 9th day of July, 1888, giving notice to the said John J. Moore, and warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor, on or before the 5th day of September next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree shall not pass as prayed.

"Massey Hall" Preparatory School.

The annual examinations were held in the study rooms on Monday and Tuesday, June 4th and 5th, and school work for the second year formally closed on the evening of the last day. Papers were given in physiology, English grammar, physics, Latin and the mathematics, and the results must be gratifying to the patrons of this school. The attendance has been regular and the school year of nine months has been marked by steady work and increasing interest on the part of the pupils. We again call attention to the inadequate facilities for extended work. Simply for lack of room pupils have been declined. We should as a town show sufficient interest in higher grades of education to urge the speedy erection of suitable buildings, especially since we have now practical knowledge of what is being done. Our people from the first expected much from the energetic principal and they have not been disappointed, and the grade maintained in the school is sufficient evidence of his intention and ability. We learn that there will be special clases for summer studies during the long vacation and a special course arranged for teachers who desire advanced studies. Applicants will be admitted, to a limited number, for practical training in school work, fitting them both for higher grades in our county examinations and greater success in the winter teaching. The eminently practical work done in the past year both by principal and pupils must give pleasure to those who so generously aided in the foundation of the school.

The Bank Site Secured.

At a meeting of the Directors of the Garrett County Bank Tuesday the location for the bank building was decided upon. It is the lot between Offutt's and Hinebaugh's stores, on Main street. The building will be of brick, which are now being manufactured at Lake View, near Oakland, by Alderson & Offutt, and will be erected this summer, at a cost of $5,000.

Notice.

All persons knowing themselves indebted to the firm of F. & C. Felty, either by note or book account, will please call and settle the same on or before July 1, 1888, otherwise all claims will be placed in the hands of an officer for collection.

Yours Respectfully,
F. & C. FELTY.

Deer Park.

Col. E. C. Tillson has just had two cancers drawn from his face. About five or six years ago he was struck on the cheek by a piece of lumber, and after two or three years the cancer commenced growing, though until lately he did not know the nature of the sore. Another small one, probably the out-growth of the first, came a year ago on his temple. About a month ago he heard of the wonderful success of Rev. A. M. Evers, of Keedysville, Presiding Elder of the U. B. Society in our district, in removing cancers, and sent for him to take his case. Now he is entirely relieved and Mr. Evers says in his twenty years' practice, he has never known a return of a cancer which he has taken out. It seemed a dangerous thing to try on one of Col. Tillson's advanced age, as the suffering of the first few days is almost unendurable, but Mr. Evers told of cases of old and very feeble men, who had been successfully operated on, and the alternative was too terrible to think of. The operation consisted in merely applying a plaster to the outside, and leaving it to do its work. The smaller one dropped off the 23d and the larger one the 29th day after being applied. It is certainly a wonderful process and should be generally known.

The Y. G. C. F. S. of Deer Park held their semi-annual meeting for admitting new members Sunday last. Misses Jennie Hoye, Georgina Savage, Mary Marville and Isa Marley were made members, and given the silver maltese cross, which is the Society badge, by the President Mrs. J. W. Williams. Misses Lizzie Steyens, Emma Savage, Mollie Grimm, Minnie Sisk, Katie Low and Georgina Taggart were admitted as candidates for membership next November, and donned the blue ribbon, which is the candidates' badge.

Mrs. Graham, of Piedmont, is visiting her son, Mr. D. F. Graham.

Mrs. Dan'l Eutler, of Piedmont, will make her home in Deer Park this summer.

Mrs. H. G. Davis, Mrs. S. B. Elkins and Mrs. G. W. Haulenbeek with their families are in their summer residences here.

Mrs. H. L. Grant, of Grafton, spent last week in Deer Park with Mrs. L. H. Schoolfield.

Mr. Oscar Droege, of Baltimore, is here on a visit to his parents.

The regular meeting of the Band of Hope was held last Saturday evening. A very interesting programme and a pleasant talk from Rev. G. W. W. Amick.

The M. E. Society here hold a quarterly meeting next Sunday.

Mr. J. G. Latta has been quite ill lately, but is now out again.

Miss Mona Tillson returned lately from Baltimore, where she spent the winter.

Oregon Letter.

SALEM, OREGON, May 30, 1888.

ED. REPUBEICAN.—In response to the request of many friends in Garrett county, I will try to give a few facts which I have gathered concerning Western Oregon. It is not because Oregon is inferior to California that so much has been said in favor of the latter, and so little in favor of the former. Until quite recently but little has been done to stimulate emigration to Oregon. The great advantages in Oregon are, the mild climate, abundance of timber and pure running water. I am certain that Oregon far surpasses any Pacific State or Territory, and Marion county is the garden spot of Oregon. This comprises a valley 150 miles long and fifty wide, through the centre of which flows the Williamette river, which affords ample water transportation to the sea. Besides there are four railroads in operation running across and through the valley.

You all remember what severe weather we had in Garrett county from the 12th to the 15th of March. I left there on the 17th, and arrived here on the 23d, and found a great change from the snow-buried, ice-bound and frost-bitten glades of Garrett to the verdure clad valleys and hills of Western Oregon. I found the peach trees in full bloom, and prunes, blumbs and cherries opening their buds. There was no cold weather here after the 1st of February, and the weather has been fine ever since we came here. This is a great wheat county, farmers often realizing 50 bushels per acre; but grain growing will eventually be superceded by fruit raising. This is the natural home of the prune, and our peaches, apples and cherries cannot be surpassed anywhere. Potatoes and all kinds of vegetables are produced here in obundance. Timber is abundant and of the best quality and timber lands can be bought at from $1.25 to $5.00 per acre.

We have churches all through the valley, with well organized and conducted Sunday schools.

Land can be bought in the vicinity of Salem at from $15 to $50 per acre, according to location and improvements. But the price of land here must advance rapidly in the near future.

I quote a few prices taken from a market report in one of our local papers: Wheat, 67 cents; Flour, $4 per barrel; Oats, 35 @ 40; bran, $15 per ton; eggs, 15c; Potatoes, 40c; dried apples, 12½ @ 15; prunes, 12½; bacon, sides, 10; shoulders, 7; beef, 8 @ 12½; hay, per ton, $20; wood per cord, $3 @ $4; lumber, undressed, $10 per thousand; dressed, $20 per thousand; laborers per day, $1 and board; mechanics average $2.50 to $3.50 per day, cows, $20 to $50; horses, per span, $150 to $500.

One important feature of this State which I had almost forgotten, is the free public school system. Our chools are kept open nine months in the year. The average pay for teachers $44 per month.

We have no potato bugs, and hog cholera is unknown.

In conclusion I desire to say that I have no object or aim in view in writing beyond that of gratifying the requests of my many friends I left in Garrett county, and I do not wish one of them to sell out their homes and come to this county until they come and see for themselves, as everyone does not see and think alike. But I will say that if any of you ever start West don't stop short of Western Oregon.

B. F. SNYDER.

Death of Ex-Mayor Humbird.

CUMBERLAND, Md., June 5.—John Jumbird, a director of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal and one of Cumberland's most prominent citizens, died suddenly about 5 o'clock this morning, at the summer residence of his brother Jacob, five miles west of this city. He died of heart failure, brought on by indigestion. Deceased was a native of Westmoreland county, Pa., and in his 79th year. He came of a hardy race of farmers, and learned the wheelwright's trade. In early life both deceased and his brother Jacob, who survives him, began railroad building.

Pic-Nic.

There will be a pic-nic held on the land of Mr. Silas Walters, on Deep Creek, on the 4th of July, 1888. Good music and refreshments in the ground. A general invitation is extended. The best of order will be preserved. G. J. Walters and C. F. Hodes, committee.

BROKEN THE COMMANDMENT.

I love her tho' she is not mine,
Nor ever can be, more's the pity!
And yet I can not account it wrong
To worship one so young and pretty.

To look into her eyes so soft,
To steal a kiss when she will let me,
To clasp her in these arms of mine
When she by chance or stealth has met me.

She's but a bud upon life's tree;
My leaf is in the sear and yellow;
I'm growing old and gray and bald,
A foolish, fond and fat old fellow.

What's more, I am a married man.
Yes, that's a fact. You needn't start so,
Nor look so horrified to hear
This little witch should stir my heart so.

Her very shadow on the grass,
The echo of her voice I love it;
I can but wish that she were mine,
Tho' Scripture says, "Thou shalt not covet!"

My neighbor's wife, his ox, his ass,
For all I wouldn't give a quarter;
I covet nothing that is his—
Except his blue-eyed baby daughter.

SMANTHY.

Why the Family Take Such Good Care of Her Now.

The point which I had reached in the long, sinuous ascent was as high as the crests of the range of hills beyond the valley to the westward. Dazzling shafts of light came straight and level across the undulating line of dark-green with which the distant declivities were covered, and I found myself in the warm glow of a summer sunset.

Three miles away, by the road I had come, but appearing to lie almost at my feet down in the valley of Salt Creek, was Georgetown, the only village in Indiana populated by gold miners. Nor are they miners, in a strict use of the term, as their labor consists only of washing the yellow dust from the beds of sand along the creek, where, according to one of those wonderful stories which geologists tell, it was dropped by a melting glacier from the far north.

But however its presence may be accounted for, there is a very light sprinkling of gold dust through the sand along the "crick" just at this point, and a score or more of slow-moving men, by close industry and tedious washing and sifting, continue to maintain a laborious existence. The reckless extravagance and lucky "finds" which have been associated with the richer mining of our Western States are lacking here, and there is simply, and without exception, heavy labor with its meager returns. Even the unkempt farmer who 'tends his "craps" along the rocky hillsides of the surrounding country has a better opportunity to wrest a competency from the soil than has the "gold-digger."

As I stood half way up the ragged brush-grown hill, the valley below was in shade, and the windings of the "crick," from bluff to bluff of its restricted bottoms, appeared plain and white away to the north, where a jutting promontory closed the view. Agriculture has made light inroads on the heavy growth of timber which hides the angles and ravines of the earth's warm bosom. Here and there an irregular "claim," inclosed by a rude brush fence, showed an ugly patch on the green mantle.

"I reckin you don't see many likelier sections o' kentry than that thar, stranger?"

The speaker had come down the hill unnoticed, as I stood looking at the wild landscape and the beautiful touches of color which the sun was laying, with lavish generosity, upon the highest of the dark, uplifted masses opposite me.

"It surely is a sight worth coming far to see," was my scarcely candid reply.

"Yes sir," he continued, taking the words for the highest praise; "when Cajer Pauley an' me left Carliny, we never 'lowed we'd find sich a kentry as this hyar un. That 'uz nigh onto twenty-five year ago, an' I reckin I'll die an' be berried in the graveyard down thar at the diggins'. That's Cajer's corn-patch over yander, an' that smoke risin' up behind them trees is from his cabin. I 'low Smanthy's gittin' supper."

"Is Samantha Mr. Pauley's wife?"

"Who? O, yes, Smanthy—yes, she's Cajer's wife. I reckon you 'uz never in these parts much, stranger, er you'd a heered about Smanthy. You see it 'uz this hyar way with her; she wuzn't like Cajer, fer he allus said he didn't keer whether the leaves on the trees 'uz green er blue, ef he could raise a crap o' corn to suit him; an' ef the rocks wanted to be big an' have moss on 'em, an' little cracks o' water a-tumblin' down over 'em, he 'lowed it made no difference to him so they wuzn't in the way o' workin' his claim.

"But, ez I 'uz a-sayin', Smanthy wuzn't like Cajer. She 'uz allus a-talkin' about the hills a-bein' so purty an' green in the spring o' the year, an' she'd nigh a'most take a fit about a little spring o' clear like water a runnin' over the rocks er tricklin' out from under the roots o' a tree. Seemed like she 'uz sort o' weakly, too, an not pert an' rugged like Cajer's side o' the fambly. Many a time I've seed her go down to the spring below them trees you see over thar whar the smoke is, an' set down on a rock an' jes' set an' look up hyar at this hill without sayin' a word fer sometimes half an hour, in the evenin' when the sun 'uz a-shinin' on the top, the way it is now, an' ever'thin' down yander in the holler 'uz still an' sort o' dark like. She set a heap o' store by flowers, too, an' when the johnny-jump-ups an' dandylions begun to come out an' the weather 'uz a-gittin' warm she'd go up in the woods an' gether all she could carry.

"Cajer, he used to 'low sometimes that Smanthy ort to be a-doin' somethin' to help take keer o' the children, 'stead o' traipsin around the timber; but she'd only sort o' smile like, an' say the best part o' her life 'ud be a-lackin' ef she couldn't see the purty things that 'uz so common ever'wheres.

"Well, one day, about fifteen years ago, Cajer'd gone down to the diggin's to get a grist o' corn ground fer to make corn-bread, an' Smanthy got the cabin redied up an' went up the hill behind the truck-patch an' into the woods, to look fer flowers an' to see what the children 'uz a-doin'. When she got up thar about forty rod, she could smell somethin' a-burnin', an' purty soon she heerd the children a-screamin' like bein' killed. She ran up the hill through the bushes an' turned around the pint of a sort o' off shoot of the bluff, an' then she seed what 'uz the matter. They had made a fire in the leaves that laid on the ground thick over winter, an' it had spread out an' got clean around 'em, an' when Smanthy see 'em, it 'uz a-burnin' tur'ble fierce an' gettin' closter to 'em ever' minit. She never stopped her runnin', but jes' went tearin' right through them blazes ten foot high, an' grabbed the two youngest, an' held 'em clost agin her breast an' bent her head down over 'em like, an' run out to a safe place. Then, without stoppin' to take a breath, she run back agin—fer the fire 'uz a-drorin' up into a mighty small ring by that time—an' grabbin' the other one o' the children up, she hugged it clost, an' sort o' wrapped her dress around its head, an' then run out with it.

"When they started down to the cabin, Smanthy made the children lead her, she 'uz burnt that bad, an' seemed like she couldn't see very well, fer she kep' a-stumblin' an' askin' the oldes' gal which way to go.

"Along in the evenin', Cajer, he come home, an' went in the cabin hungry as a houn'; but supper wuzn't ready, not even a fire burning in the stove. He 'uz powerful vexed, an' axed where Smanthy wuz. The children said she 'uz a-settin' down to the spring. He up and went a-tearin' down thar, purty mad, an' thar she set on the rock, a-cryin' soft, an' tryin' to look up hyar at the sun a-shinin' on the top o' this hill. She heerd him a-comin', an' sez she, kind o' quiet like, afore he could open his mouth: 'Cajer,' says she, 'I'm that burnt that I'm blind, an' can't see the sunshine n'r the flowers n'r the children no more.' An' then she bust out cryin' like she'd die.

"Cajer went back to the diggin's an' got the doctor, an' he 'tended on her for nigh onto six months. Her face 'uz allus kind o' smooth-like an' white, an' her eyes 'uz blue an' big an' looked plumb through a feller, afore that; her hair 'uz sort o' crinkly, too, like the shaller water in the crick whar it runs swift; but when she got well, they 'uz big scars all over her face, an' her hair 'uz ez stiff an' straight ez wire, un' the wust thing 'uz that she 'uz that blind that she couldn't tell whether it 'uz day or night.

"After that it seemed like she 'uz sort of stupid, an' nothin' Cajer n'r any o' the neighbors could do' 'ud make her chirk up. She jes' set there quiet, an' never said nothin' hardly, an' every day when the sun 'uz a-shinin' she'd have one o' the children lead her down to the rock by the spring, an' then she'd turn her face up to'rds this hill like she 'uz a-tryin' to see the yeller light on the trees an' rocks up hyar.

"I reckin her a-grievin' an' a sorrowin' that way sort o' changed her, fer she got to be like a child agin. The children 'uz a-growin' up, an' they set a heap o' store by ther mammy, recollectin' how her sufferin' all come from her savin' them; an' Cajer, too, seemed like he 'uz a-tryin' to make up fer bein' contrairy sometimes afore she uz hurt. Yes, they take mighty good keer o' Smanthy now, an' she seems kind o' happy an' les' like a little gal.

"That's why I said a while ago that I 'lowed Smanthy 'uz a-gettin' supper. She thinks nothin' 'ud be done ef it warn't fer her, an' the rest o' 'em they don't say nothin' to contrairy her. She scrapes the taters, an' strings the beans, an' ever'-thin' o' that kind, an' then after she gits done one o' the children takes 'em an' goes away whar she can't hear, an' fixes them all over agin, fer not bein' able to see, she can't do it right. When they git done eatin,' nothin' 'll do but she must have a rag an' dry the dishes, and then one o' the gals wipes 'em agin. It makes a feller feel kind o' curus in the throat to see Cajer huntin' around in the woods fer flowers fer Smanthy to hold in her hand an' smell of, 'cause he don't keer nothin' for sech things, an' 'ud a heap ruther be a-workin' in the clarin'. Yes, the fambly is mighty good to Smanthy; but I 'low, ef she hadn't a-ben good to them, it's them, an' not her, as 'ud be a-settin' around to be waited on—ef they 'uz a-livin' at all.

"You must be a-goin', must you? Yes, it is a-gettin' quite late, an' ef you're aimin' to git to Nashville tonight, you won't have much time to spare. Good-evenin'; that's my cabin you'll go by, up thar on the right hand of the road.

"O, say, stranger! Look down, thar, jes' a leetle to the left o' that bunch o' timber. Do you see somethin' white an' small-like, thar? Well, that's Smanthy; she comes thar ever' evenin' when it's gettin' sort o' dark down in the holler, an' looks up to'rds the sun a-shinin' on the top o' this hill."—Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

LIFE AND MANNERS.

Traits Whose Possession Will Make a Man a Gentleman Wherever He May Be.

Tact is a product of good feeling and quick observation. Essential to it is sympathy with others, and it is essential to true courtesy. No man by merely learning rules of etiquette can acquire habits of courtesy. Even if he does learn the rules and obey them, he will be angular, unnatural, cold. His actions will not be the product of an inward feeling. They will, therefore, not be the expression of his own nature. His love will always be with dissimulation. The foundation of true courtesy is the law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself;" the rule of true courtesy is, "Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you." The King who violated the most alphabetic law of etiquette, by pouring the tea from his cup into his saucer to cool and then drinking it from his saucer, in order to give countenance to a guest who had done so, while the courtiers laughed in their sleeves at his ignorance, exhibited a model of courtesy, because he showed a perfection of tact. Courtesy is simply love applied in social life to the conduct of small affairs. Good feeling and good sense underlie almost all rules of courtesy. The first thing, therefore, for one to do who wishes to develop a courteous habit is to develop good feeling and good sense. The truth finds expression in the Greek original rendered in our English Bible, be courteous; it is literally be friendly-minded. All true courtesy is the product of a friendly mind. Boorishness is a product of selfishness far more than a product of ignorance; or at least a product of that ignorance which is itself a product of selfishness. I was once at a wedding breakfast in a rural community in the West. The groom ate in silence the food that was set before him, dispatched his meal before the rest of us were more than half through, pushed back his plate, wiped his mouth with the back of his hand, and, turning to his bride, said: "Well, Sally! you may as well get used to my way at the beginning, and I always leave the table when I have got through with my meal." With these words he went out to pick his teeth on the door-steps, leaving his bride with a flushed face and a pained heart, the object of our commiseration. The man was a boor, you say. True! What made him a boor? The fact that he selfishly thought only of his own comfort. It never entered his head to inquire whether his conduct would be agreeable or painful to his bride.

The foundation of courtesy is laid in the home. If early lessons are not taught there it is well-nigh impossible to compensate for the lack by subsequent culture. If the child is taught to be unselfish, sympathetic, considerate of the feelings of others in the home, he will carry this habit with him wherever he goes. He may be ingorant of those conventional laws of etiquette which vary in different localities, but he will everywhere be recognized as a man of good breeding. Thus it is that courtesy becomes a family and even a national trait. The Frenchmen and the Japanese are courteous, because they are trained to consider the feelings of others. The English as a nation are not courteous. Their courtesy is a matter of court etiquette, and adjusts itself according to classes. There is more conscience on the English side of the Channel, more courtesy on the French side. So, again, courtesy shows itself in certain old families. It has become a second nature by long processes of training and inheritance. Nothing can quite take the place of this good breeding in producing good manners, for nothing less will make tact a second nature. Courtesy, for instance, requires me, if I go into a Roman Catholic Church, to bow my head when all the worshipers are bowing theirs. I have no right to impose my disbelief upon other religious worshipers, and so wound their feelings and interrupt their worship. A member of one school of medicine may refuse to consult with a member of another school of medicine, but he has no right to do it in a discourteous manner—that is, in a way needlessly to wound the feelings of his brother-man. The sum of the whole matter, then, is this: To be courteous is to be friendly-minded; it is to have tact; it is to be sympathetic with other people, and observant of their needs, their wishes, their feelings, and in speech and action considerate of them. If one lacks this spirit of sympathetic consideration, no study of rules of etiquette will make him truly courteous. If he possesses this spirit of consideration, he will be instinctively courteous to all men and women in all circumstances, and will then have only to inform himself as to certain general rules of courtesy applicable alike in all localities and stations, and as to some specific rules of etiquette which convenience has established in special cases and in particular localties or for existing social conditions. All the general rules of courtesy and most of the special rules of etiquette have a foundation in common sense as well as in kindly feeling.—Lyman Abbot, D D., in Chautauquan.

Not the Key-Hole.

A citizen stood in an unsteady way gazing at a front door on First street the other night, and another belated who passed that way halted and asked:

"Looking for the key-hole, old fellow?"

"Chee-hole!"

"Yes."

"No, zur. I've goz way beyond zhat, sur. I'm looking for 'er door itself. Sheems to be too many of 'em here."—Detroit Free Press.

COUNTERFEIT MONEY.

The Vast Amount of Queer Goods in the Government Treasury.

"There is money enough there to make you and me rich for the rest of our lives," said a Secret Service official to the correspondent. The conversation took place in one of the rooms of the Secret-Service Division in the Treasury Department, and "there" was a vault from which messengers were carrying little canvas bags and packages done up in manila paper and sealed with red wax. "But I am afraid," the official continued, "that it wouldn't do us much good. There are a couple of million dollars there, but, every cent of it is bogus."

The "queer" was being taken out of the Secret-Service vaults to be examined by a committee which has been appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury for that purpose previous to being destroyed. It is eleven years ago since the last counterfeit money in the Treasury was destroyed, and these $2,000,000 represent the work of the counterfeiting fraternity since that time. Whenever a shover of the queer is captured with any bogus stuff on him the money is sent to Washington, where it lies in a vault until enough has been accumulated, when it is destroyed. Each capture is kept separate from the others, and the bogus coin is treated just the same as if it were United States money, just issued from the mint. The care which is exercised is shown in the manner in which the packages are marked. Here is a sample:

"No. 104 B. One thousand and forty-eight.

"A. One hundred and twenty dollars ($120), twenty-five cent coin."

The number and letter A refers to a record and complete inventory which is kept of every cast.

"We have in that collection," said the Secret Service man, "gold and silver and every thing in the shape of paper from a one-cent revenue stamp up to a thousand-dollar government, which is the largest bond that has ever been counterfeited. There are 208 of the thousand-dollar bonds which were made by the great firm of Brockway, Smith & Doyle, probably the three greatest men in their business we have ever known. Some of the work on the bonds is finer than the genuine, but that is accounted for when you remember that Smith was the engraver who did the work for the Government, and when he went into business for himself he improved on his first effort.

"Stories connected with this money! I should say. Here is some stuff (and he picked up a bag of half-dollars) which was taken from a gang of eighteen that operated in West Virginia in 1882 and 1883. Their leader was a member of the State Legislature, and when we bagged him at last he boasted of having spoken on the floor of the House with counterfeit money in his pockets. No, I can't tell you his name, because since his release from prison, where we sent him, he has been living a respectable life and is now in business in West Virginia and is doing well."

"There's some stuff we captured at Oswego, N. Y., in 1880. The brains of that gang was a Mrs. Ingersoll, and a pretty bad woman she was, too. Two of her daughters were with her, and, as they were very pretty girls, the old woman found them very useful in fascinating young men of a certain class, so that at last they were willing to do any thing the girls wanted. This package recalls a tragedy. It was made by a big gang in Indiana some years ago, and when our men went to arrest them one of the fellows shot an officer through the hand, and he promptly returned the fire and shot his man through the heart."

"Is there much counterfeiting going on at the present time?"

"No, very little. The only man of any prominence in the business we know of now out of jail is Pete McCartney, and he is now being tried in New Orleans for raising one dollar silver certificates. You see, it takes a good deal of money to counterfeit notes. There must be a good engraver, a man who knows his business thoroughly, and a first-class printer. It takes from six months to a year to engrave the plates, and during that time the men have to live. McCartney's principal work was issuing bogus $20 greenbacks, and in his time he must have made thousands and thousands of dollars out of them. About three months ago he was released from prison, but he had no money, and to tide him over until he could get funds he tried to turn one dollar silver certificates into fifties and was caught."

Besides the $2,000,000 of bogus money, there are millions of dollars in what are known as "flash" notes. These imitations are greenbacks used for advertising purposes, and although they were not got up for fraudulent purposes, it is a violation of the law to make any sort of imitation of United States currency or Government obligation. These flash notes are often passed off on the Negroes of the South as good money by confidence men. The Secret Service people at a rough guess believe they have $50,000,000 worth of flash notes in their possession. All this bogus money will be counted by the Treasury Committee. The notes will be sent to the macerator and ground into pulp and come to life again in the shape of sickly-looking pug dogs or busts of Garfield and Cleveland, while the coin will be melted down at the Navy Yard and perhaps become eventually part of the new navy.—*Washington Cor. WHAT THEY DO.

The Saloon a Kindergarten for Instruction in Drinking—How the Rum Thirst Is Created.

Save in the States and portions of States in which the traffic in rum has been outlawed, there is not a city in which the streets are not dotted with saloons with open doors, inviting all to enter; not a town where they are not found, not a village but has its dramshop. They cater for all classes of men, from the pretentious saloon on a prominent street, adorned with paintings and resplendent with mirrors and frescoing, its bar frequented by well-dressed men, whose calls are served by bartenders in immaculate linen and diamonds, down to the lowest dive, filled with the poorest and most degraded, whose demands for rum are responded to by a dirty keeper, who serves out doctored whisky and stale beer. To a visitor from some other sphere, it would appear that the males of the human race are possessed of a strange thirst, a madness for rum, that requires the means of its satisfaction to be easily accessible to every one.

The fact in the case is, however, that the saloons are not so much the means through which the craving for rum can be conveniently satisfied without loss of time, as they are training-schools for drunkards, kindergartens for instruction in drinking. Instead of being established for the purpose of satisfying a terrible thirst, which must be appeased, they are the means whereby the thirst is first awakened in tens of thousands of men. It is an awful fact that there exists such a thing as the rum thirst—that, through indulgence, the physical system of the drinker becomes so diseased that it demands more of the same poison as the only means of deliverance from its pangs. It is a thirst which has its parallel in the opium habit and other phenomena of the kind. But if the saloons were to be confined to the supplying of the demands of the unhappy victims of this accursed thirst, they would soon die out for want of patronage; for the man who has become the slave to rum is an habitual drunkard, and in the majority of cases soon becomes so poor that his custom is not profitable; while his life, after he reaches this stage, is short, as disease and rum soon carry him to a dishonored grave.

We repeat, if the patronage of the saloons were restricted to this class of men—these in whom the rum habit is fully established—they would speedily become largely reduced in numbers. At least half of them would at once become unprofitable, and their keepers would be driven to close their doors and turn their attention to some better occupation. Hence, it follows that half the saloons, at least, exist solely because of the persons who are dallying with rum, and allowing the rum appetite to grow upon them by insidious steps. They exist because of the men who are learning to be drunkards—who are slowly debasing their manhood by making themselves dependent upon alcohol in some form.

These men are "moderate drinkers." They scorn the idea that they should ever become the besotted, debased victims of the rum habit, yet they are treading the path which leads directly to that goal. The great majority of these frequenters of the saloon are young men—men with life all before them, and with but little to aid them in the struggle to achieve success save their talents and energy. They are full of ambition, buoyant with hope; yet they indulge in "moderate" drinking, oblivious of the fact that moderate drinking leads directly to immoderate drinking. Rum palsies physical and mental energy, deadens ambition, and substitutes leaden despair for buoyant hope; and he who aspires to achieve success in his life-struggle with the world would better daily with a venomous serpent than to indulge in rum, even though it be in moderation.

There are examples, we know, of men who achieved success who were also drinking-men, but they are the exceptions. For every one of these who can be named, there are a thousand—yes, ten thousand—who have failed in business and made a wreck of their lives through rum. The vast majority of men can not fight the world successfully with rum for a friend. Then, too, the young man should consider the fact that the feeling is growing everywhere that the young man who frequents saloons is an unsafe person to employ. No merchant wants him for an important clerkship, no business firm desires to trust him, no self-respecting young woman wishes to put her life's happiness into his hands, no one wishes to put business responsibilities under his control. The shortest and best avenues to worldly success are closed against him from the start.

Man is a gregarious animal, and loves to meet his fellows. Here is one secret of the saloon's success, of its terribly debasing power over mankind. With its light, and warmth, and sociability, the saloon's attractions are great to many men, especially if they lack that finer mental fiber which revolts at coarseness, and rudeness, and ribald or vulgar conversation. In place of seeking to find ennobling and safe associations, of making a social place for themselves among pure surroundings, they take the ready-made society they find in saloons. Once a part of the current they go steadily downward with it.

The saloon is thus the primary school in which men take their first lessons in drinking. It is an institution which caters to an unworthy appetite which in every man will struggle to overmaster him, and which will come out the victor in the struggle in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred. If the saloons were all swept away, the total amount of drinking would be reduced probably one-half at one stroke. Tens of thousands who have just begun the insidious habit of moderate drinking would be saved from what is now their certain destiny—drunkenness and ruin.—Toledo Blade.

Wine at Communion.

A correspondent desires to know if there are any cases on record of reformed drunkards being led astray by use of fermented wine at the communion table. We have no doubt that many cases could be cited. Of one case we have knowledge. A Scotch judge, member of the Presbyterian church, with whom the writer's father was on intimate terms, was peculiar for his refusal to receive wine at the communion table. He had contracted a strong liking for wine when a student, had become so much the victim of it that he judged total abstinence his only safeguard, had been tempted again and again by the sacramental cup, and had finally declined to put himself in the way of temptation by refusing the cup altogether. There is nothing unphilosophical about this. The appetite for drink once contracted, even when fairly mastered, is not necessarily entirely eradicated. It may be, like a trained wild beast, only harmless till the opportunity and temptation to be ravenous occurs, and then it asserts itself with all the old-time domoniac fierceness. The very dubiousness of the risk incurred by a temptable nature's tampering with the wine is a sufficient reason for his refusal to thus expose himself. The end of the communion is sacramental. It may also be a sacrament to resist evil in the refusal to be tempted by fermented wine.—N. W. Christian Advocate.

Real Reformation.

The honest and intelligent worker in reform believes that real reformation means action; that no one ever reformed who did not forsake the causes which kept him depraved and sinful; that the reformed man must maintain an active and vigorous warfare against the enemy that betrays him into infamy; that he must be cheerful and high-spirited; that he must turn his back upon the saloon and face away from temptation; that he must covet the good things that are in the good man's heart and repulse the evil things that follow corrupt associations; that he can not love and follow God's commands and live in low and vulgar dissipation; that he must be watchful of his appetite lest he put into his stomach that which will open the floodgates of the devil and engulf the soul by destroying the body; that he must love and educate his family; that he must be humane and generous toward the weak and feeble; that he must be honest and industrious. For no man can reform if he be not honest with himself and those around him. He must get close to nature, for God is there and nature is everywhere.—The Washingtonian.

SCOTLAND has one hundred and thirty-seven post-offices kept in places where intoxicating liquors are sold.

FIVE HUNDRED of the seven hundred women in Warksworth work-house, London, have been drunkards.

JUDGE WHITE, of Pittsburgh, Pa., recently published a letter in which he says: "From thirteen years' experience in the criminal court I am thoroughly convinced that there are far more evils resulting from the use of beer in this country than from whisky."

JUDGE WILLIAM A. CHENEY of California, says that during his term as a criminal judge, out of every one thousand cases which came before him whisky had something to do with making the criminal in nine hundred of these cases; that is the greatest evil on earth, and that he will die before another drop shall pass his lips.

READING FOR THE YOUNG.

STORY OF A PISTOL.

A Lesson in Self-Conquest—The Courage of a Fine Soldier.

Fifty years have passed since a merry trio met in Mason street. Bright lads were they, as full of youthful fire and enthusiasm as any of their age now-a-days. John was by birth and ancestry an American, and so was Leopold, despite the foreign ring to his name, but Franz was the son of a German soldier, who had served under the great Napoleon.

Herr Niebuhr delighted in rehearsing for his son's entertainment glowing tales of martial exploits under his adored leader, and even the horrors of the Russian campaign had a strange charm, told in his impassioned German. What boy ever listened, unmoved, to stories of courage and heroism? Franz's soul was fired, and he was wont to meet his gay companions at their daily rendezvous in the little stable adjoining John's house, and there repeat his father's stories with kindred fervor and enthusiasm. Listening to these tales of war, the boys made a very natural mistake; fire-arms seemed an essential adjunct to heroic deeds, and they longed to possess some weapon as a sort of preparation for future acts of valor.

"Suppose we each carefully save our money," John proposed, "and constitute it a common fund. Then, when we have enough, buy a pistol."

"Agreed," cried Franz and Leo.

A few weeks passed, and the boys, having amassed a sufficient sum, enthusiastically marched in a body to select the long-coveted article. They bought a pistol, after much haggling, for a dollar and a quarter, and plentifully supplied themselves with powder, shot and percussion caps. The little weapon, which they handled with so much pride, would now be considered a very insignificant affair. It had a wooden handle, the barrel was of brass, and the rest of the weapon was of steel.

The first flush of joyous possession passed, and Franz echoed the thought of each when he asked, "Where shall we keep it?" for each boy knew that his parents would disapprove of the purchase The upper floor of the barn was their council chamber, and here between the beams they hid their treasure.

They frequently met to stealthily admire the weapon and to plan hopefully for some future opportunity to practice with it.

"I declare," cried Franz, one day, "it's a lot of fun stealing up here to see this pistol. I wish we could go off somewhere and shoot at a target, as father does."

"Wouldn't it be glorious!" cried John; "but I don't see how we ever can manage it," he added, dejectedly.

"It's a shame we can't just fire her off here," said Leo.

"Oh, mercy!" cried John, in dismay; "it would be worse than a hornet's nest, for we should have the whole neighborhood about our ears in no time."

"Wouldn't we get a blowing up if our folks knew?" said Franz.

"We'd lose our pistol mighty quick," Leo replied.

"Hush," said John, treading on Leo's toes, "father's coming;" while Franz whisked the pistol into his pocket, just as the stalwart form of Mr. Carter appeared.

"What's this about a pistol, boys?" he asked.

The boys were confounded, but ready-witted Franz replied: "We think it would be so nice to own one, sir."

"Is that all, John?" asked Mr. Carter.

"Ye-es, sir," stammered John, blushing, and looking very uncomfortable under his father's keen glance.

"I suppose you believe, boys, that to be a soldier is to be a hero?" said Mr. Carter.

"Yes, sir," answered Franz, decidedly.

"Undoubtedly," Mr. Carter continued, "many soldiers have been true heroes, but the men who have become soldiers from pure love of adventure, or hope of reward, by far outnumber those who have taken their lives in their hands to fight for a principle. All honor to the noble souls who have given their all for what they considered a great cause—there are many glorious instances of such in history, but I particularly like to think of the large army who have fought, and are ever fighting, bloodless battles and winning deathless victories."

"Who can you mean, father?" said John, wonderingly.

"You boys are so taken with wars and battles that you forget that there is something higher than mere physical courge," said Mr. Carter. "The Bible says: 'Better is he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city.' And this is the kind of warfare you boys need to engage in. It takes the highest kind of courage to conquer one's self, and through all the ages, the men who have done the noblest work for their kind have been those who first fought this fight. It is said of Luther that his words were half-battles. Read his life, boys, and see what sort of courage he had, and try to get something like it," was Mr. Carter's parting injunction.

"I do feel so mean," said John, as his father disappeared; "I am a coward to deceive such a good father. But I wouldn't have him find it out now for any thing. We must put the pistol somewhere else."

"I've thought of a capital place," said Leo; "let's put it under the plank-walk; no one will ever find it there."

That night the pistol, with powder, shot and percussion caps, was snugly stowed away under the planks. The next few days were rainy, and when the boys again met to examine their possessions, they found their property greatly damaged.

"The powder's just good for nothing, Franz declared, greatly disgusted; "and the metal is corroded; here we haven't fired a shot, and our pistol's ruined."

"Glad of it!" Leo boldly cried; "we've had precious little fun since we've owned it."

"The truth is, boys," said John, "our consciences haven't been quite easy. Let's go over to the common and make an end of the whole thing:"

The others easily assented, anxious to rid themselves of their troublesome property. The powder, shot and percussion caps were quietly dropped into the pond, but the pistol received severer treatment; each boy successively tried his strength upon it with a heavy stone, and the fragments were left, a monument of blighted hopes.

"We haven't had such a frolic in a long time," said Leo; "good riddance, bad rubbish!"

"So say I," echoed Franz.

John parted from the boys with a merry laugh, but his heart was heavy.

"They haven't lied outright," he reflected. "Can I ever atone for these weeks of deception? Shall I ever be happy again?" he asked himself. "I have it! I must tell father the truth."

Mr. Carter was grieved and shocked, and yet gratified that his son possessed the courage to confess his fault.

"You have been acting a cowardly part, my son," he said, "but you have at last shown the courage of a true soldier; henceforth be loyal to truth, don't dally with temptation. One sin begets another. Ask yourself: 'Is this right?' and turn from a wrong course with decision. The world is in need of honest and true men, and they are the world's best heroes."

The history of the pistol is fresh in John's mind to-day, and he would say to the thoughtless lad, beware of the first wayward act; value the simple but grand principles of honesty and truth; be a hero in the temper of your mind, and your life will be heroic. — Elizabeth E. Backup, in Watchman.

WINTER CLOTHING.

Comprehensive Directions for Putting It Away for Summer.

Where the house is roomy, and the closests so arranged that they may be aired frequently, it is a very easy matter to keep the winter clothing free from the depredations of moths. But if this is not the case, the next best thing is to know how to put the clothes away properly.

All clothing before being placed away should be aired thoroughly. Hang out in the air all coats, dresses, furs, etc., whip free of dust, turn all the pockets inside out, brush with a corn brush broom, and let hang in the air an hour or two. If there is a brisk wind blowing, all the better, and in this case less time is required to air them. When sufficiently aired take in. Have made some little muslin bags, into each one of which put a small piece of camphor. Place one of these bags into each coat or dress pocket. Turn each dress skirt inside out, fold neatly, place a newspaper between each one, and do all up in strong newspaper, pasting it so as not to leave the smallest crevice by which a moth could enter.

Coats should be folded lengthwise, but never across, and done up the same as the dresses. Furs should be placed in their boxes, a camphor bag put in with them, the boxes done up in newspaper, and the ends fastened with paste. If no boxes are convenient, then simply put the camphor bag inside the muff, and wrap the set in newspaper fastened as above. Newspaper is much better than wrapping paper for this work, as moths abhor printers' ink. Some use cloth for this purpose, making cotton bags especially for it, but cloth is not as good as the paper. Felt hats and bonnets, bits of plush, velvet, etc., should be put in a box, into which put a camphor bag, and do up securely in newspaper.

Have ready the shelves, drawers or boxes in which the clothing is to be placed. If shelves, cover with newspaper, place the bundles as neatly as convenient in them, and cover all with newspaper. Line drawers in the same way, cover with newspaper, tucking it in all around. Where a person can afford it, a cedar chest is the best receptacle for winter clothes, requires no camphor, and will last a lifetime. Cedar chips are excelent to scatter among clothes; they give them a pleasant odor, and are very obnoxious to moths. When placing the clothing away in boxes or trunks, line the insides with newspaper, pasting it firmly to the wood, pack the bundles in carefully, and cover with newspaper, tucking it in around the edges. Bitter apples are said to be a sure preventive for moths. They can be bought at the chemist's, put in muslin bags and placed in chests, drawers, etc., and moths will not trouble any article in these places. A tallow candle wrapped in brown paper, and placed among the clothes that are laid away for any length of time, will keep the moths at a distance. This is an old-fashioned remedy, but a good one.—American Cultivator.

THIEVES BY BIRTH.

New York Detectives Say There Is No Such Thing as Kleptomania.

"Two skilled detectives agree in the theory that the disease known as kleptomania does not exist. 'When a rich woman steals fifty dollars worth of goods she has kleptomania,' said one of them, 'and when a poor woman steals fifty cents' worth of bread to feed her starving children she is a thief. Show me a panper with a real bad attack of kleptomania,' and I will believe that there is such a disease, for, if there is, why should not the poor be as susceptible to it as the rich? My impression at present is that people are born thieves, as they are born musicians or singers—it is a gift, though a deplorable one, and is accompanied by great cunning and sagacity. Another fact which disproves the kleptomania theory is that never in my experience of many years have any goods been returned or paid for by the friends of people afflicted with this imaginary malady; it is only when discovered stealing that they and all their friends call them kleptomaniacs. When a woman comes in here and buys a new bonnet and walks off bold with it on her head without paying for it, or takes a waterproof off a figure and puts it on herself before us all, I know she is a victim of mental aberration and treat her accordingly. If, however, there are kleptomaniacs, one of the best known remedies for them is found in a police court—it is almost a sure cure. Many rich women who have large accounts at stores, and are apparently unlimited as to money, will take twenty-five cent articles surreptitiously if they can, and the clerks make up the deficit in their bills or accounts. A wagon load of goods was recovered in the house of a rich woman by one firm, the goods being stowed away under the servant girl's bed, and never having been used or cut into. But the peculiarity among rich shoplifters lies in the cheapness of the articles they pilfer, which would signify a rather diseased mental condition and a desire simply to steal."—N. Y. Sun.

FORESTRY FOR FARMERS.

An Intelligent Estimate of Varieties of Trees For Different Purposes.

The high price which black walnut lumber has brought for a few years has set the unthinking to planting it largely, when in fact it is one of the poorest possible trees for general utility, and on many soils is not a rapid grower. The black walnuts now being marketed at a price which makes a single log pay for an acre of land, were in the nut stage about the time the Pilgrims landed, and are materially different in size and quality from the spongy growth of thirty or even fifty years, and the farmer who would dabble in forestry for the benefit of the next following generation can scarcely do worse than plant the black walnut. For the smaller uses of the farm—such as handles and whiffletrees—the shell bark hickory is excellent. It thrives in many kinds of soil, and under cultivation will reach a diameter of five inches, three feet from the ground, in twenty years, from the seed. For strength, elasticity and finish second-growth hickory excels any other known wood. For the larger hardwood repairs on the farm—such as wagon-poles and axles, levers, wagon and sled stakes and doubletrees—the white ash is the most desirable tree a farmer can plant. It is rapid in growth and the wood is tough, elastic and durable when painted. It will sprout from the stump after cutting, and thus indefinitely continue the plantation, once established. It seems to thrive equally well in clay or gravely loam, and is readily raised from seed.

For fencing, there is no rapid-growing tree so good as the sweet American chestnut, but it does not seem to thrive on prairie soils or heavy limestone clays, its natural home being the sandy ridges underlaid by conglomerate. The durability of chestnut timber either in or out of the ground is second only to red cedar, and I wonder that more farmers do not start plantations of this valuable wood. On a farm near where I live are chestnut rails still doing duty in a fence that were split in 1815; and the other day I took out a greenhouse post of second-growth chestnut that had done service for eighteen years, and for an ordinary fence I think it would have lasted ten years longer. In localities where the chestnut does not thrive I would plant the yellow locust, which is so generally well known. The only objection is its liability to injury by the borer, and I have no doubt that some means will be devised to head off this pest, when there is a general demand for such a remedy. For profit other than its timber value I believe it will pay to put out sugar-maple groves. On good soils, if not planted too close (say forty trees per acre), trees will do to tap at thirty years from planting, and probably for 100 years thereafter. Toward the close of the decade ending with 1860 there was quite a boom in street-tree planting throughout Northern Ohio, and in some counties premiums were offered by agricultural societies for the best row of twenty-five maple trees planted by one individual. Many of these trees are now from twelve to sighteen inches diameter, and on some farms have been tapped three or four times. When planted most of them were about one and one-half inches diameter, and were taken from the woods, the top being cut off at a suitable height. Had smaller trees from a fencerow or nursery, with better roots, been planted, probably nearly all would have lived, instead of less than twenty-five per cent., and the trees would have been as large or larger now. The maple is natural to dairy regions, and in such sections young trees can generally be had for the digging. The planting and staking of a few acres of pasture would cost but little, as it could be done in early spring, and the pasturing value of the ground would be but slightly impaired for at least two-thirds of the time it would take to get the trees to a sugaring-producing age. The most profitable part of many dairy farms is the sugar-bush, the labor of which is mostly performed when nothing else can be done, and it seems to me that it would be wise to extend the maple orchard for the benefit of another generation.—L. B. Pierce, in N. Y. Tribune.

Food for Young Chicks.

As feed for young chicks, boiled rice and oatmeal are very good; but as they are sticky it is best to stir in dry cornmeal or some other dry meal, to make it easier to eat. All soft food for chicks should be so dry as to crumble when dropped. Soft, watery messes should be avoided. Feed chicks when young four times a day, and as soon as they can run around well a feeding coop of laths on three sides, the fourth one being of boards, should be placed on each spot where there are several coops of chicks. The spaces between the laths should be large enough to admit the chicks only. Turn the boarded side to the south, to keep the sun off the food, which should be placed inside, so that the chicks can get it when they please. This should be cracked corn or wheat; the wheat is much the better, but only enough of all should be given, as they will eat up clean each time.—Rural New Yorker.

WHY BROWN WAS JILTED.

A Domestic Melodrama and Its Harrowing Consequences.

The other day Miss Jones spent the afternoon with her friend and former school-mate, Mrs. Smith, who has been married several years and has a beautiful boy.

"I heard the other day that you were engaged to Mr. Brown. Is there any truth it?" asked Mrs. Smith of her friend, who was holding the baby.

"I am not engaged to Mr. Brown."

"But ain't you going to be? He is such a nice, steady young man."

"That depends upon circumstances. One thing is sure, if he expects me to take advantage of my leap-year privileges he will wait a good long while," replied Miss Jones.

"But would you accept him if he were to propose?" queried Mrs. Smith.

"I am not quite sure that I would. Men are so unreliable."

"Don't you love him?" asked Mrs. Smith.

"O, he is a very nice gentleman, but there are so many unhappy marriages that I don't think I care to take any risks."

"You should get married by all means. I used to think and talk just like you, but now that I am married I am twice as happy as I was. I have a good, kind husband."

"You never quarrel, I suppose. He never says any thing rude or unkind, and he never goes out at night and comes home late?"

"O, no, of course not."

"Never grumbles about the expense?"

"What a strange girl you are? What makes you ask such foolish, silly questions?"

"Well, you know there are some such husbands."

"I've read about some such cases of brutality, and I've heard people talk about such husbands, but I don't know any thing about it."

"I am so glad for your sake that you are happy. How sound the dear little fellow sleeps."

"Yes; I wish you would take him in the next room and put him in his little cradle," said Mrs. Smith. Her friend complied with her request.

While Miss Jones was in the next room the door was suddenly opened and Mr. Smith entered. He had just come home and did not know Miss Jones was in the house. It was plain to see that he was as mad as a wet hen. Shaking a bill at his wife, he said in a hoarse, cynical tone:

"Here is another one of your infernal bills. You must think I'm made of money."

"H-u-s-h!" said his wife, putting her finger to her lips and pointing into the other room.

"Hush," he blanked, "I don't give a continental whether the blank brat squalls or not. I want you to understand that I don't propose to put up with any more of your extravagance. This is is the second hat you have had since we were married. Do you propose to break me up in business with your senseless extravagance? By the way you buy new hats one would suppose you had half a dozen fool heads on your shoulders."

"O, George! Dear George!"

"Just cheese that 'deah George' racket (mimicking her.) Only last week I I paid a grocery bill of one dollar and thirty-seven cents. You must think I'm a little Jay Gould on wheels. Did a man bring a demijohn of brandy and two hundred cigars for me?"

"Yes, and here is the bill for fifty-seven dollars."

"For heaven's sake quit looking as if you were going to blubber! I just came home to tell you not to sit up for me. After the lodge is out I am going so attend a little oyster supper with the boys and some theatrical people down at the hotel. I may not get back before three o'clock," and off he was.

Of course Miss Jones heard every word of this joint discussion, and when, shortly afterward, Brown proposed, he was jilted and bounced so promptly that he left the house without his hat and cane. He was even more astonished than the lightning was when it struck a magazine containing 1,756,843 pounds of giant powder.—Mocking Bird.

Printers Exempt from Cholera.

The printers have been exceptionally exempt from falling victims to the cholera epidemics which have recently occurred in the South American continent. When the yellow fever epidemic in 1868 created consternation here the Typographical Union had only to pay the expenses for two members, and both of them recovered. Now today the same incident is recorded in Chili with respect to cholera, where we find that, according to the report of the president of the Typographical Union of Valparaiso, up to the date of his last report, not one of the one hundred members of the Union had been attacked. Thus they enjoyed the same good fortune they had experienced during the previous year.—Lima (Peru) Prensa.

Why He Could Think So.

Two men on a railway train began to discuss a book which the newsboy had left on the seat.

"I think it is a very weak thing," said one of them. "I examined it awhile ago, and I see that the characters are weak and ill drawn."

"I like it very much," the other man replied. "I think it is one of the finest pieces of fiction ever produced in this country."

"I don't see how you can think that."

"I do, for, you see, I wrote it."—Arkansaw Traveler.

A HOME IN INDIA.

Where Comfort, as We Understand It, Is Comparatively Unknown.

A mud-paved court open to the sky—that glorious sun-illumined sky of India, that gives poetry to every thing; but enclosed with walls and surrounded by a sort of arcade or veranda. Within it three or four women—wearing the loose trousers of the Mussulman woman, and colored sarees like the Hindus—and several young girls. They were not handsome, being rather of the thick-lipped Nubian type; but several of them, as especially the elder women, who teaches in the little school, looked intelligent, and they received us with courtesy and apparent pleasure. The children from outside were not present, a circumstance for which the elder woman apologized; but she brought forward her own children to be examined, and they acquitted themselves with credit, reading fluently from an Indian primer, and answering all the questions my friend put to them.

This family, poor as their surroundings seemed to be, enjoys a moderate prosperity. Comfort, as we understand it, is unknown in Indian homes.

Our next visit was to a Hindu family of the poorer class. Our scramble over rubbish heaps and drains recommenced, and landed us at the foot of a break-neck flight of stairs, which, when we had ascended, we came upon the funniest little corner of the world in which it has ever been my lot to find myself. It was part of a house, but what part of it was, one found it difficult to make out. To me it seemed like a balcony or ledge hung on the side of the house. On one side guarded by a high parapet, it was open to the sky, and looked down on a large bare court, while on the other side was a range of untidy-looking cupboards and cells.

In this curious nest a little flock of women, young and old, with a few children were gathered together. They received us with the utmost courtesy (a grace that never deserts the Hindu at home) set for us the wicker stools that are kept for visitors, and, drawing their sarees about them, squatted round us after their fashion. One and another in the meantime, were pouring out little ejaculations of welcome, which my friend, who is a fluent speaker of Hindustani, answered smilingly. Presently there came out from a small enclosure, which was more like a bathing machine than any thing else I can think of, a young and very pretty woman, with a small baby in her arms. The little creature who appeared to be the latest arrival in the crowded nest, was handed round, kissed, praised and commented upon, while the young mother stood by smiling. I learned upon inquiry she was eighteen years of age, and that this was her fourth child.

The baby having received the fitting amount of attention, a bright little girl, with eyes as brilliant as stars, was brought forward to read her lesson. She was only seven years old, and her readiness, intelligence and pretty, winsome manner made her one of the most bewitching little creatures I ever beheld, while I must say that no English child of her years could have surpassed her in knowledge. Other little ones, who were not so brilliant, followed, and then the women took their turn, spelling out the Indian primer patiently.—Quiver.

WALKING FOR HEALTH.

An Exercise Which Is a Nerve Tonic and Appetizer Both in One.

Few people who have not tried the experiment know how much health there is in walking. It is a nerve tonic, an appetizer and a general system invigorator all in one. When the weather is too fickle too discard winter wraps, and when occasional warm half-hours suggest seersuckers and white hats, a "dead-and-alive feeling" is apt to result, which may not be a disease, but but which is very akin to illness. "Spring bitters" and old-fashioned "sulphur and molasses" are time-honored remedies, but the best cure of all is exercise, taken regularly and in doses sufficient to effect a cure. To a majority of people engaged in active business walking is the handiest exercise procurable. The man who walks to and from his office or store not only gets up an appetite and a circulation, but he wards off congestion and pneumonia, and if he is of an observing turn of mind he also sees many incidents and traits of character which will both amuse and instruct him.

Writing about the benefit to be gained from walking, an eminent London physician says: "Until I took up walking to and from my office I was a hollow-chested, dyspeptic man, weighing about 125 pounds, very nervous and very dissatisfied with myself and the world in general. As soon as I began to walk regularly a change for the better was noticed. I now weigh 160 pounds, I sleep well and have a perfect digestion, all of which I credit to pedestrianism, These were the benefits I sought, but they were not all I gained. I am an old resident of London, and naturally I know a great many of its citizens by sight. I soon discovered that some of the wealthiest and most successful men I knew were regular pedestrians. I also observed that the men who had themselves won great success were the fastest walkers, passing by their fellow pedestrians in their walks to this city. I now lay it down as an axiom that the man who outstrips his competitors in walking on the streets will also win in whatever business he undertakes."—Boston Globe.

READING FOR THE YOUNG.

STORY OF A PISTOL.

A Lesson in Self-Conquest—The Courage of a Fine Soldier.

Fifty years have passed since a merry trio met in Mason street. Bright lads were they, as full of youthful fire and enthusiasm as any of their age now-a-days. John was by birth and ancestry an American, and so was Leopold, despite the foreign ring to his name, but Franz was the son of a German soldier, who had served under the great Napoleon.

Herr Niebuhr delighted in rehearsing for his son's entertainment glowing tales of martial exploits under his adored leader, and even the horrors of the Russian campaign had a strange charm, told in his impassioned German. What boy ever listened, unmoved, to stories of courage and heroism? Franz's soul was fired, and he was wont to meet his gay companions at their daily rendezvous in the little stable adjoining John's house, and there repeat his father's stories with kindred fervor and enthusiasm. Listening to these tales of war, the boys made a very natural mistake; fire-arms seemed an essential adjunct to heroic deeds, and they longed to possess some weapon as a sort of preparation for future acts of valor.

"Suppose we each carefully save our money," John proposed, "and constitute it a common fund. Then, when we have enough, buy a pistol."

"Agreed," cried Franz and Leo.

A few weeks passed, and the boys, having amassed a sufficient sum, enthusiastically marched in a body to select the long-coveted article. They bought a pistol, after much haggling, for a dollar and a quarter, and plentifully supplied themselves with powder, shot and percussion caps. The little weapon, which they handled with so much pride, would now be considered a very insignificant affair. It had a wooden handle, the barrel was of brass, and the rest of the weapon was of steel.

The first flush of joyous possession passed, and Franz echoed the thought of each when he asked, "Where shall we keep it?" for each boy knew that his parents would disapprove of the purchase The upper floor of the barn was their council chamber, and here between the beams they hid their treasure.

They frequently met to stealthily admire the weapon and to plan hopefully for some future opportunity to practice with it.

"I declare," cried Franz, one day, "it's a lot of fun stealing up here to see this pistol. I wish we could go off somewhere and shoot at a target, as father does."

"Wouldn't it be glorious!" cried John; "but I don't see how we ever can manage it," he added, dejectedly.

"It's a shame we can't just fire her off here," said Leo.

"Oh, mercy!" cried John, in dismay; "it would be worse than a hornet's nest, for we should have the whole neighborhood about our ears in no time."

"Wouldn't we get a blowing up if our folks knew?" said Franz.

"We'd lose our pistol mighty quick," Leo replied.

"Hush," said John, treading on Leo's toes, "father's coming;" while Franz whisked the pistol into his pocket, just as the stalwart form of Mr. Carter appeared.

"What's this about a pistol, boys?" he asked.

The boys were confounded, but ready-witted Franz replied: "We think it would be so nice to own one, sir."

"Is that all, John?" asked Mr. Carter.

"Ye-es, sir," stammered John, blushing, and looking very uncomfortable under his father's keen glance.

"I suppose you believe, boys, that to be a soldier is to be a hero?" said Mr. Carter.

"Yes, sir," answered Franz, decidedly.

"Undoubtedly," Mr. Carter continued, "many soldiers have been true heroes, but the men who have become soldiers from pure love of adventure, or hope of reward, by far outnumber those who have taken their lives in their hands to fight for a principle. All honor to the noble souls who have given their all for what they considered a great cause—there are many glorious instances of such in history, but I particularly like to think of the large army who have fought, and are ever fighting, bloodless battles and winning deathless victories."

"Who can you mean, father?" said John, wonderingly.

"You boys are so taken with wars and battles that you forget that there is something higher than mere physical courge," said Mr. Carter. "The Bible says: 'Better is he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city.' And this is the kind of warfare you boys need to engage in. It takes the highest kind of courage to conquer one's self, and through all the ages, the men who have done the noblest work for their kind have been those who first fought this fight. It is said of Luther that his words were half-battles. Read his life, boys, and see what sort of courage he had, and try to get something like it," was Mr. Carter's parting injunction.

"I do feel so mean," said John, as his father disappeared; "I am a coward to deceive such a good father. But I wouldn't have him find it out now for any thing. We must put the pistol somewhere else."

"I've thought of a capital place," said Leo; "let's put it under the plank-walk; no one will ever find it there."

That night the pistol, with powder, shot and percussion caps, was snugly stowed away under the planks. The next few days were rainy, and when the boys again met to examine their possessions, they found their property greatly damaged.

"The powder's just good for nothing, Franz declared, greatly disgusted; "and the metal is corroded; here we haven't fired a shot, and our pistol's ruined."

"Glad of it!" Leo boldly cried; "we've had precious little fun since we've owned it."

"The truth is, boys," said John, "our consciences haven't been quite easy. Let's go over to the common and make an end of the whole thing;"

The others easily assented, anxious to rid themselves of their troublesome property. The powder, shot and percussion caps were quietly dropped into the pond, but the pistol received severer treatment; each boy successively tried his strength upon it with a heavy stone, and the fragments were left, a monument of blighted hopes.

"We haven't had such a frolic in a long time," said Leo; "good riddance, bad rubbish!"

"So say I," echoed Franz.

John parted from the boys with a merry laugh, but his heart was heavy.

"They haven't lied outright," he reflected. "Can I ever atone for these weeks of deception? Shall I ever be happy again?" he asked himself. "I have it! I must tell father the truth."

Mr. Carter was grieved and shocked, and yet gratified that his son possessed the courage to confess his fault.

"You have been acting a cowardly part, my son," he said, "but you have at last shown the courage of a true soldier; henceforth be loyal to truth, don't dally with temptation. One sin begets another. Ask yourself: 'Is this right?' and turn from a wrong course with decision. The world is in need of honest and true men, and they are the world's best heroes."

The history of the pistol is fresh in John's mind to-day, and he would say to the thoughtless lad, beware of the first wayward act; value the simple but grand principles of honesty and truth; be a hero in the temper of your mind, and your life will be heroic. — Elizabeth E. Backup, in Watchman.

WINTER CLOTHING.

Comprehensive Directions for Putting It Away for Summer.

Where the house is roomy, and the closests so arranged that they may be aired frequently, it is a very easy matter to keep the winter clothing free from the depredations of moths. But if this is not the case, the next best thing is to know how to put the clothes away properly.

All clothing before being placed away should be aired thoroughly. Hang out in the air all coats, dresses, furs, etc., whip free of dust, turn all the pockets inside out, brush with a corn brush broom, and let hang in the air an hour or two. If there is a brisk wind blowing, all the better, and in this case less time is required to air them. When sufficiently aired take in. Have made some little muslin bags, into each one of which put a small piece of camphor. Place one of these bags into each coat or dress pocket. Turn each dress skirt inside out, fold neatly, place a newspaper between each one, and do all up in strong newspaper, pasting it so as not to leave the smallest crevice by which a moth could enter.

Coats should be folded lengthwise, but never across, and done up the same as the dresses. Furs should be placed in their boxes, a camphor bag put in with them, the boxes done up in newspaper, and the ends fastened with paste. If no boxes are convenient, then simply put the camphor bag inside the muff, and wrap the set in newspaper fastened as above. Newspaper is much better than wrapping paper for this work, as moths abhor printers' ink. Some use cloth for this purpose, making cotton bags especially for it, but cloth is not as good as the paper. Felt hats and bonnets, bits of plush, velvet, etc., should be put in a box, into which put a camphor bag, and do up securely in newspaper.

Have ready the shelves, drawers or boxes in which the clothing is to be placed. If shelves, cover with newspaper, place the bundles as neatly as convenient in them, and cover all with newspaper. Line drawers in the same way, cover with newspaper, tucking it in all around. Where a person can afford it, a cedar chest is the best receptacle for winter clothes, requires no camphor, and will last a lifetime. Cedar chips are excelent to scatter among clothes; they give them a pleasant odor, and are very obnoxious to moths. When placing the clothing away in boxes or trunks, line the insides with newspaper, pasting it firmly to the wood, pack the bundles in carefully, and cover with newspaper, tucking it in around the edges. Bitter apples are said to be a sure preventive for moths. They can be bought at the chemist's, put in muslin bags and placed in chests, drawers, etc., and moths will not trouble any article in these places. A tallow candle wrapped in brown paper, and placed among the clothes that are laid away for any length of time, will keep the moths at a distance. This is an old-fashioned remedy, but a good one.—American Cultivator.

THIEVES BY BIRTH.

New York Detectives Say There Is No Such Thing as Kleptomania.

"Two skilled detectives agree in the theory that the disease known as kleptomania does not exist. 'When a rich woman steals fifty dollars worth of goods she has kleptomania,' said one of them, 'and when a poor woman steals fifty cents' worth of bread to feed her starving children she is a thief. Show me a pauper with a real bad attack of kleptomania,' and I will believe that there is such a disease, for, if there is, why should not the poor be as susceptible to it as the rich? My impression at present is that people are born thieves, as they are born musicians or singers—it is a gift, though a deplorable one, and is accompanied by great cunning and sagacity. Another fact which disproves the kleptomania theory is that never in my experience of many years have any goods been returned or paid for by the friends of people afflicted with this imaginary malady; it is only when discovered stealing that they and all their friends call them kleptomaniacs. When a woman comes in here and buys a new bonnet and walks off bold with it on her head without paying for it, or takes a waterproof off a figure and puts it on herself before us all, I know she is a victim of mental aberration and treat her accordingly. If, however, there are kleptomaniacs, one of the best known remedies for them is found in a police court—it is almost a sure cure. Many rich women who have large accounts at stores, and are apparently unlimited as to money, will take twenty-five cent articles surreptitiously if they can, and the clerks make up the deficit in their bills or accounts. A wagon load of goods was recovered in the house of a rich woman by one firm, the goods being stowed away under the servant girl's bed, and never having been used or cut into. But the peculiarity among rich shoplifters lies in the cheapness of the articles they pilfer, which would signify a rather diseased mental condition and a desire simply to steal."—N. Y. Sun.

FORESTRY FOR FARMERS.

An Intelligent Estimate of Varieties of Trees For Different Purposes.

The high price which black walnut lumber has brought for a few years has set the unthinking to planting it largely, when in fact it is one of the poorest possible trees for general utility, and on many soils is not a rapid grower. The black walnuts now being marketed at a price which makes a single log pay for an acre of land, were in the nut stage about the time the Pilgrims landed, and are materially different in size and quality from the spongy growth of thirty or even fifty years, and the farmer who would dabble in forestry for the benefit of the next following generation can scarcely do worse than plant the black walnut. For the smaller uses of the farm—such as handles and whiffletrees—the shell bark hickory is excellent. It thrives in many kinds of soil, and under cultivation will reach a diameter of five inches, three feet from the ground, in twenty years, from the seed. For strength, elasticity and finish second-growth hickory excels any other known wood. For the larger hardwood repairs on the farm—such as wagon-poles and axles, levers, wagon and sled stakes and doubletrees—the white ash is the most desirable tree a farmer can plant. It is rapid in growth and the wood is tough, elastic and durable when painted. It will sprout from the stump after cutting, and thus indefinitely continue the plantation, once established. It seems to thrive equally well in clay or gravely loam, and is readily raised from seed.

For fencing, there is no rapid-growing tree so good as the sweet American chestnut, but it does not seem to thrive on prairie soils or heavy limestone clays, its natural home being the sandy ridges underlaid by conglomerate. The durability of chestnut timber either in or out of the ground is second only to red cedar, and I wonder that more farmers do not start plantations of this valuable wood. On a farm near where I live are chestnut rails still doing duty in a fence that were split in 1815; and the other day I took out a greenhouse post of second-growth chestnut that had done service for eighteen years, and for an ordinary fence I think it would have lasted ten years longer. In localities where the chestnut does not thrive I would plant the yellow locust, which is so generally well known. The only objection is its liability to injury by the borer, and I have no doubt that some means will be devised to head off this pest, when there is a general demand for such a remedy. For profit other than its timber value I believe it will pay to put out sugar-maple groves. On good soils, if not planted too close (say forty trees per acre), trees will do to tap at thirty years from planting, and probably for 100 years thereafter. Toward the close of the decade ending with 1860 there was quite a boom in street-tree planting throughout Northern Ohio, and in some counties premiums were offered by agricultural societies for the best row of twenty-five maple trees planted by one individual. Many of these trees are now from twelve to sighteen inches diameter, and on some farms have been tapped three or four times. When planted most of them were about one and one-half inches diameter, and were taken from the woods, the top being cut off at a suitable height. Had smaller trees from a fencerow or nursery, with better roots, been planted, probably nearly all would have lived, instead of less than twenty-five per cent., and the trees would have been as large or larger now. The maple is natural to dairy regions, and in such sections young trees can generally be had for the digging. The planting and staking of a few acres of pasture would cost but little, as it could be done in early spring, and the pasturing value of the ground would be but slightly impaired for at least two-thirds of the time it would take to get the trees to a sugaring-producing age. The most profitable part of many dairy farms is the sugar-bush, the labor of which is mostly performed when nothing else can be done, and it seems to me that it would be wise to extend the maple orchard for the benefit of another generation.—L. B. Pierce, in N. Y. Tribune.

Food for Young Chicks.

As feed for young chicks, boiled rice and oatmeal are very good; but as they are sticky it is best to stir in dry cornmeal or some other dry meal, to make it easier to eat. All soft food for chicks should be so dry as to crumble when dropped. Soft, watery messes should be avoided. Feed chicks when young four times a day, and as soon as they can run around well a feeding coop of laths on three sides, the fourth one being of boards, should be placed on each spot where there are several coops of chicks. The spaces between the laths should be large enough to admit the chicks only. Turn the boarded side to the south, to keep the sun off the food, which should be placed inside, so that the chicks can get it when they please. This should be cracked corn or wheat; the wheat is much the better, but only enough of all should be given, as they will eat up clean each time.—Rural New Yorker.

WHY BROWN WAS JILTED.

A Domestic Melodrama and Its Harrowing Consequences.

The other day Miss Jones spent the afternoon with her friend and former school-mate, Mrs. Smith, who has been married several years and has a beautiful boy.

"I heard the other day that you were engaged to Mr. Brown. Is there any truth it?" asked Mrs. Smith of her friend, who was holding the baby.

"I am not engaged to Mr. Brown."

"But ain't you going to be? He is such a nice, steady young man."

"That depends upon circumstances. One thing is sure, if he expects me to take advantage of my leap-year privileges he will wait a good long while," replied Miss Jones.

"But would you accept him if he were to propose?" queried Mrs. Smith.

"I am not quite sure that I would. Men are so unreliable."

"Don't you love him?" asked Mrs. Smith.

"O, he is a very nice gentleman, but there are so many unhappy marriages that I don't think I care to take any risks."

"You should get married by all means. I used to think and talk just like you, but now that I am married I am twice as happy as I was. I have a good, kind husband."

"You never quarrel, I suppose. He never says any thing rude or unkind, and he never goes out at night and comes home late?"

"O, no, of course not."

"Never grumbles about the expense?"

"What a strange girl you are? What makes you ask such foolish, silly questions?"

"Well, you know there are some such husbands."

"I've read about some such cases of brutality, and I've heard people talk about such husbands, but I don't know any thing about it."

"I am so glad for your sake that you are happy. How sound the dear little fellow sleeps."

"Yes; I wish you would take him in the next room and put him in his little cradle," said Mrs. Smith. Her friend complied with her request.

While Miss Jones was in the next room the door was suddenly opened and Mr. Smith entered. He had just come home and did not know Miss Jones was in the house. It was plain to see that he was as mad as a wet hen. Shaking a bill at his wife, he said in a hoarse, cynical tone:

"Here is another one of your infernal bills. You must think I'm made of money."

"H-u-s-h!" said his wife, putting her finger to her lips and pointing into the other room.

"Hush," he blanked, "I don't give a continental whether the blank brat squalls or not. I want you to understand that I don't propose to put up with any more of your extravagance. This is is the second hat you have had since we were married. Do you propose to break me up in business with your senseless extravagance? By the way you buy new hats one would suppose you had half a dozen fool heads on your shoulders."

"O, George! Dear George!"

"Just cheese that 'deah George' racket (mimicking her.) Only last week I I paid a grocery bill of one dollar and thirty-seven cents. You must think I'm a little Jay Gould on wheels. Did a man bring a demijohn of brandy and two hundred cigars for me?"

"Yes, and here is the bill for fifty-seven dollars."

"For heaven's sake quit looking as if you were going to blubber! I just came home to tell you not to sit up for me. After the lodge is out I am going so attend a little oyster supper with the boys and some theatrical people down at the hotel. I may not get back before three o'clock," and off he was.

Of course Miss Jones heard every word of this joint discussion, and when, shortly afterward, Brown proposed, he was jilted and bounced so promptly that he left the house without his hat and cane. He was even more astonished than the lightning was when it struck a magazine containing 1,756,843 pounds of giant powder.—Mocking Bird.

Printers Exempt from Cholera.

The printers have been exceptionally exempt from falling victims to the cholera epidemics which have recently occurred in the South American continent. When the yellow fever epidemic in 1868 created consternation here the Typographical Union had only to pay the expenses for two members, and both of them recovered. Now to-day the same incident is recorded in Chili with respect to cholera, where we find that, according to the report of the president of the Typographical Union of Valparaiso, up to the date of his last report, not one of the one hundred members of the Union had been attacked. Thus they enjoyed the same good fortune they had experienced during the previous year.—Lima (Peru) Prensa.

A HOME IN INDIA.

Where Comfort, as We Understand It, Is Comparatively Unknown.

A mud-paved court open to the sky—that glorious sun-illumined sky of India, that gives poetry to every thing; but enclosed with walls and surrounded by a sort of arcade or veranda. Within it three or four women—wearing the loose trousers of the Mussulman woman, and colored sarees like the Hindus—and several young girls. They were not handsome, being rather of the thick-lipped Nubian type; but several of them, as especially the elder women, who teaches in the little school, looked intelligent, and they received us with courtesy and apparent pleasure. The children from outside were not present, a circumstance for which the elder woman apologized; but she brought forward her own children to be examined, and they acquitted themselves with credit, reading fluently from an Indian primer, and answering all the questions my friend put to them.

This family, poor as their surroundings seemed to be, enjoys a moderate prosperity. Comfort, as we understand it, is unknown in Indian homes.

Our next visit was to a Hindu family of the poorer class. Our scramble over rubbish heaps and drains recommenced, and landed us at the foot of a break-neck flight of stairs, which, when we had ascended, we came upon the funniest little corner of the world in which it has ever been my lot to find myself. It was part of a house, but what part of it was, one found it difficult to make out. To me it seemed like a balcony or ledge hung on the side of the house. On one side guarded by a high parapet, it was open to the sky, and looked down on a large bare court, while on the other side was a range of untidy-looking cupboards and cells.

In this curious nest a little flock of women, young and old, with a few children were gathered together. They received us with the utmost courtesy (a grace that never deserts the Hindu at home) set for us the wicker stools that are kept for visitors, and, drawing their sarees about them, squatted round us after their fashion. One and another in the meantime, were pouring out little ejaculations of welcome, which my friend, who is a fluent speaker of Hindustani, answered smilingly. Presently there came out from a small enclosure, which was more like a bathing machine than any thing else I can think of, a young and very pretty woman, with a small baby in her arms. The little creature who appeared to be the latest arrival in the crowded nest, was handed round, kissed, praised and commented upon, while the young mother stood by smiling. I learned upon inquiry she was eighteen years of age, and that this was her fourth child.

The baby having received the fitting amount of attention, a bright little girl, with eyes as brilliant as stars, was brought forward to read her lesson. She was only seven years old, and her readiness, intelligence and pretty, winsome manner made her one of the most bewitching little creatures I ever beheld, while I must say that no English child of her years could have surpassed her in knowledge. Other little ones, who were not so brilliant, followed, and then the women took their turn, spelling out the Indian primer patiently.—Quiver.

WALKING FOR HEALTH.

An Exercise Which Is a Nerve Tonic and Appetizer Both in One.

Few people who have not tried the experiment know how much health there is in walking. It is a nerve tonic, an appetizer and a general system invigorator all in one. When the weather is too fickle too discard winter wraps, and when occasional warm half-hours suggest seersuckers and white hats, a "dead-and-alive feeling" is apt to result, which may not be a disease, but but which is very akin to illness. "Spring bitters" and old-fashioned "sulphur and molasses" are time-honored remedies, but the best cure of all is exercise, taken regularly and in doses sufficient to effect a cure. To a majority of people engaged in active business walking is the handiest exercise procurable. The man who walks to and from his office or store not only gets up an appetite and a circulation, but he wards off congestion and pneumonia, and if he is of an observing turn of mind he also sees many incidents and traits of character which will both amuse and instruct him.

Writing about the benefit to be gained from walking, an eminent London physician says: "Until I took up walking to and from my office I was a hollow-chested, dyspeptic man, weighing about 125 pounds, very nervous and very dissatisfied with myself and the world in general. As soon as I began to walk regularly a change for the better was noticed. I now weigh 160 pounds, I sleep well and have a perfect digestion, all of which I credit to pedestrianism. These were the benefits I sought, but they were not all I gained. I am an old resident of London, and naturally I know a great many of its citizens by sight. I soon discovered that some of the wealthiest and most successful men I knew were regular pedestrians. I also observed that the men who had themselves won great success were the fastest walkers, passing by their fellow pedestrians in their walks to this city. I now lay it down as an axiom that the man who outstrips his competitors in walking on the streets will also win in whatever business he undertakes."—Boston Globe.

Suffering in the South.

"You northerners knew very little about the sufferings that war entails," said a southern woman. "Some of you may have lost money; some surely did lose husbands, sons, brothers or relatives of some degree; but none of you suffered the pangs of hunger, as we did."

"I have heard there was much privation, but I suppose we could not realize it from mere discription."

"Bless you, no. As the blockade grew tighter and tighter it was as though a bandage was being tied closer and closer around the neck of each one of us poor dwellers in the south. That cut off our luxuries that had almost become necessities so much had they become the component parts of our every day meals. Oh, how I have sighed for a cup of real coffee, after drinking decoctions of burnt rye or potatoes. And I used to dream how fragrant a cup of real simon pure tea would be, after sipping for months vile decoctions of sassafras."

"The army in the field also depleted the land and drew away not only provisions, but the men that might have replenished the storehouses and larders by supervising the work in the fields. The slaves were wonderfully loyal to their masters' households while the masters were away fighting. They worked faithfully, but they could not work as understandingly as when they were directed by their old employers. So the field crops were not as large as usual. And it had always been the curse of the south that it devoted so large a share of its energies to raising cotton. The Egypt of the south, Hyde county, in North Carolina, was as fertile as ever, and its stalks of corn grew, as usual, so tall that they would hide a man on horseback if he penetrated half a dozen rows into their waving mass; but the army of Virginia drew largely from that granary, leaving less for the consumption of the people.

"I remember that when Sherman's army came along many persons, once wealthy and who never knew want, watched till the cavalry horses had left their feeding troughs and then went and picked up the grains of corn the horses had wasted."

"What was the article whose loss troubled you most?"

"Salt. It grew scarcer and scarcer. After a while we boiled the bags in which bacon had been shipped and the coverings of the hams. Then, after that supply was exhausted, the ground under the smoke houses was dug up and mixed with water in huge caldrons, and roaring fires were set going. As the water bubbled up under the fierce heat, we skimmed the salt from the surface. Doubtless much sickness was chargeable to the lack of salt, which could not be procured for love or money."

"Did anybody absolutely starve?"

"I never saw any statement that anybody actually died in the south for lack of food, but many came very near it. One case that came under my own observation was particularly sad. One lady, with her daughter and two little boys, were left alone upon a farm of 150 acres, the father being absent with the army. The confederate currency had become almost worthless, its purchasing power being so diminished that I saw $50,000 given for an old horse. This family had eaten everything there was on the farm except one old hen that had escaped the raid of the foraging soldiers by running under the barn. A little corn that had been hidden in the boarding of the barn had at last given out, and the old hen was killed and cooked. There was no salt or pepper with which to season it, but it was set upon the table for what seemed to be the last meal the family would ever eat, when the door was burst open and a party of camp followers swept the fowl from the table and tore it limb from limb. A kind-hearted federal officer came along shortly after and gave the poor woman some rations. Had it not been for his providential appearance she and her little ones must have starved."

"Then it is probable you would not like to participate in another war?"

"No, no. We've had enough of war. It is the most horrid curse that ever afflicted the earth!"

Gathered Treasures.

Do your duty in little things, and you will be faithful in great ones.

Man's greatest strength is shown in standing still.

If we are God's children we need not fear the developement of His providence.

Insulting the People.

About the most disgusting piece of hypocrisy that has appeared lately is that portion of the New York Democratic platform which refers in laudatory terms to Cleveland's "reform" policy. "During his incumbency," says the platform, "our system of government has been restored to the honest simplicity impressed upon it by its founders, and integrity and ability have been substituted for artifice and incapicity in public places, the civil service has been purified, elevated and improved." Was there ever such unadulterated rot? Every word of this declaration is notoriously and abominably false, and every intelligent man knows it. Under Cleveland the public service has been prostituted to a degree never before known in the country's history, and every department of government has suffered by the substitution of inexperienced men for old and tried employés; and every intelligent man knows it. What is to be accomplished by such palpable lying? Nobody will be deceived. Every honest man will be disgusted.

Is it possible that this arrant hypocrisy is to be persisted in by the Administration, and carried through the coming campaign? It would seem so. The New York platform was prepared under the direction of those close to the President, and is a type of what may be expected in the national platform. In its assumptions it is monstrous. It assumes that the American people are such fools as to believe that black is white because they are told to. Notwithstanding that the record of the Administration is spread out before them in flaring colors, evidenced by unimpeachable facts and unyielding statistics, they are asked to believe that all they see is the reverse of what it appears, that faults and virtues, blunders, triumphs and failures reform. Faugh! It is nauseating in the extreme.

If Cleveland presumes to insult the intelligence of the country by going before it in the coming contest as a reformer, the majority that will go up against him in November will be something stupendous. The people will not be mocked.—Ex.

Kindness to the Aged.

The loneliness of age! How few think of this, and treat with due tenderness and consideration those who have outlived their generation, and whose early companions and friends have been taken from them. Unable to engage in the activities of life, they are no longer brought into contact and sympathy with those around them, and no tie of common interest and mutual dependence binds them together. Their views and tastes have naturally grown apart. They share little in common with others. The future of this life has nothing to inspire their ambitions or excite their hopes. What calls forth the energies of others has no inspiration for them. They necessarily to a great extent, live in a world of their own, with which those around them are not familiar. The communing of their hearts are with the scenes of the past and the companions of other years who have long passed away. Lovers and friends have been taken from them, and acquaintances laid in darkness. The forms they admired and loved are gone, the eyes that looked into theirs are sightless, and the voices that cheered and stirred their souls have long been silent. Their early world of hope and life has become desolated, and they sit in silence contemplating the ruin that has been wrought. They have but little to interest them in this world. Who would not do what he can to cheer the loneliness of age, to smooth their pathway, and comfort them in their declining years.—Methodist Recorder.

HOMOEOPATHY.—A good Homœopathic book—a "domestic physician"—is a medical missionary in many families and a trusty adviser in all; to one of these add a case of Homœopathic medicines and the family is as well prepared to meet sudden emergencies and sickness as human foresight can provide. The cost is not great, and when compared with the advantages sinks out of sight. Catalogue and price list mailed free on request. TORPID LIVER

Is known by these marked peculiarities:
1. A feeling of weariness and pains in the limbs.
2. Bad breath, bad taste in the mouth and furred tongue.
3. Constipation, with occasional attacks of diarrhœa.
4. Headache, in the front of the head nausea, dizziness, and yellowness of skin.
5. Heartburn, loss of appetite.
6. Distention of the stomach and bowels by wind.
7. Depression of spirits, and great melancholy, with lassitude and a disposition to leave everything for to-morrow.

A natural flow of Bile from the Liver is essential to good health. When this is obstructed it results in which, if neglected, soon leads to serious diseases. Simmons Liver Regulator exerts a most felicitous influence over every kind of biliousness. It restores the Liver to proper working order, regulates the secretion of bile and puts the digestive organs in such condition that they can do their best work. After taking this medicine no one will say, "I am bilious."

BILIOUSNESS,

"I have been subject to severe spells of Congestion of the Liver, and have been in the habit of taking from 15 to 20 grains of calomel which generally laid me up for three or four days. Lately I have been taking Simmons Liver Regulator, which gave me relief without any interruption to business."—J. HUGG, Middleport, Ohio.

In a Red Wood Forest.

The tourists and sight-seer, as well as the capitalists, can spend a week nowhere more profitably than in visiting that most wonderful forest growth in the world, the redwoods of northwestern California, says a Santa Rosa letter in the Louisville Courier-Journal. There are small groups in Mariposa and Calaveras counties, in the Sierra Nevada mountains, and more extensive areas in Santa Cruz and Monterey counties, along the coast south of San Francisco, but the only considerable forests available for commercial and local building purposes extend from the Oregon line south about four hundred miles. The belt varies in width from twenty to a hundred miles. One peculiarity of it is its steps beginning at the Oregon line and ending at the Russian river in Sonoma county. From this body of timber California is mainly supplied with building and fencing material, and vast quantities are shipped by steamers and sailing-vessels to Australia, New Zealand, and the islands of the Pacific, and by rail to several sections of the United States. Hundreds of saw-mills and thousands of axe-men and loggers are engaged in the work of destroying these forests, and converting the mighty trees into lumber and shingles for the use of men who inhabit the timberless regions. Eureka, a seaport in Humboldt county, and Guerniville, the terminus of a branch of the San Francisco and North Pacific railroad in Sonoma county, seventy-two miles from San Francisco, are the centers of the lumbering industry, from each of which many million feet of the manufactured article are annually shipped. The march of the army of axe-men and sawyers keep pace with the extension of railroads. But it will be several decades, perhaps a century, before the present growth is consumed, and as the redwood is a rapid grower and producer, there will in that time be a sufficiency of younger growth to supply local demands at least.

A tramp through a redwood forest affects one with a sense of fear, loneliness, and littleness. The writer accompanied by the manager of a lumbering company of Guernville, recently took a half-days ramble through the big tree reservation, beginning one and a half mile west of that place. No adequate idea can be conveyed of the impressions received by a "tenderfoot" in the center of a forest where such gigantic trees stand in solid phalanx. Three trees, selected at random in different parts of the forest, measured respectively eighty, seventy-six, and seventy-four feet in circumference six feet above the roots, and the first branches appeared to be at least 150 feet above the ground, to which point there is no apparent dimunition of size. A comparison of those standing with others of equal size and height that had been felled proved them to be more than 350 feet from root to topmost leaf. To see an isolated tree of such proportions is an interesting spectacle, but to be in a narrow path where they are in such proximity to each other as to momentarily change one's course is a novel experience, yet a strangely pleasurable one.

In the early morning the solemn stillness is only broken by the faint call of squirrels retreating into or emerging from their homes, hundreds of feet above you, or the twitter of the innumerable birds as they flutter in the topmost branches. But when the ocean breeze of the afternoon sweeps with violence through the thickly-interwoven branches overhead, there is a commingling of sound so fascinating and yet so unearthly that the immagination easily distorts them into music from voices and harps in spirit land.

These forests, besides furnishing the agriculturists in adjacent valleys and foot hills abundant and cheap building and fencing material, perform another important function. The leaves absorb the chilling moisture of the sea breeze in summer and break the force of the northwest wind in winter. This is a very important consideration with wool-growers and dairymen in the openings, and with fruit-growers and vineyardists, in the adjacent valleys and foothills. The forest protects the former from extreme cold in winter and the latter from late frosts in the spring.

The redwoods are not continuous over the territory called the "Redwood region." They occupy it in groups and forests, leaving wide stretches of mountain and tableland on which grass grows luxuriously several months of the year, and then curling in the hot sun becomes nutritious hay. Lands denuded of redwood trees are also soon covered with grass between the stumps.

The Invalid Child.

Once I knew a workingman—a potter by trade—who had one small invalid child at home. He wrought at his trade with exemplary fidelity, being always in the shop with the opening of day. He managed, however, to bear each evening to the bedside of the "wee lad" as he called him, a flower or a bit of ribbon, a fragment of crimson glass—indeed, anything that would lie out on the white counterpane and give a color in the room. He was a quiet, unsentimental Scotchman, but never went he home at nightfall without some trinket, showing that he had remembered the wan face that lit up so when he came in.

I presume he never said to a living soul that he loved that sick boy so much; still he went on patiently loving him. And by and by he moved that whole shop into positively real but unconscious fellowship with him. The workmen made curious little jars and tea cups upon their wheels, and painted diminutive pictures down their sides before they stuck them in corners of the kiln at burning time. One brought some fruit in the bulge of his apron, and another some engravings in a rude scrap book. Not one of them all whispered a word, for this solemn thing was not to be talked about. They put them in the old man's hat where he found them; so he understood all about it. And I tell you seriously, that entire pottery, full of men of rather coarse fiber by nature, grew quiet as the months drifted, becoming gentle and kind, and some of the ungoverned ones stopped swearing as the weary look on their patient fellow-worker's face told them beyond any mistake that the inevitable shadow was drawing nearer. Every day now somebody did a piece of his work for him, and put it upon the sanded plank to dry, thus he could come later and go earlier.

So, when the bell tolled and the little coffin came out of the door of the lowly house, right around the corner out of sight, there stood a hundred stalwart workingmen from the pottery, with their clean clothes on, most of whom gave a half-day of time for the privilege of taking off their hats to the simple procession, filing in behind it, and following across the village green to its grave that small burden of a child, which probably not one of them had ever seen with his own eyes.—Anon.

Woman's Physical Superiority.

ROBERT J. BURDETTE.

True, she cannot sharpen a pencil, and, outside of commercial circles, she can't tie a package to make it look like anything save a crooked cross-section of chaos; but see what she can do with a pin! I believe there are some women who could almost pin a glass knob to a door. She cannot walk so many miles around a billiard table with nothing to eat and nothing (to speak of) to drink, but she can walk the floor all night with a fretting baby, without going sound asleep the first half hour. She can ride five hundred miles without going into the smoking car to rest (and get away from the children.) She can go to town and do a wearisome day's shopping, and have a good time with three or four friends without drinking a keg of beer. She can enjoy an evening visit without smoking half a dozen cigars. She can endure the torturing distraction of a house full of children all day, while her husband cuffs them howling to bed before he has been home an hour. Every day she endures a dress that would make an athlete swoon. She will not, and possibly cannot, walk five hundred miles around a tan-bark track in six days for five thousand dollars, but she can walk two hundred miles, more or less, up and down the crowded aisles of a dry-goods store when there is a reduction sale on. She is afraid of a mouse, and runs from a cow, but a book agent can't scare her. She is the salt of the church, the pepper of the choir, the life of the sewing society, and about all there is of a young ladie's school or a nunnery. A boy with a sister is fortunate, a young man with a sweetheart is happy, a fellow with a cousin is to be envied, and a man with a wife is thrice blessed more than they all.

A minister had preached an hour, then he remarked: "Another wide field opens from the subject in another direction." Just then an old colored saint ejaculated: "Please, Lord, shet up de bars."

What Cost the Most.

Cost is, of course, a very unsafe measure of value in many instances, says the Decorator and Furnisher, and yet there is an unnatural curiosity on the part of the general public to know the mere money estimation in which more or less beautiful articles are held. Here are a few somewhat remarkable examples of lavish expenditure:

The highest priced piano in America is owned by H. C. Marquand, of this city. The case, which was built in London, was designed and painted by Alma Tadema. It cost $46,000.

Sir Donalp Smith, of Montreal, is the owner of the costliest piano ever made in this country. It cost when landed in Montreal, $27.000.

The most expensive sideboard ever made in the United States is owned by Judge Henry E. Packer, of Mauch Chunk, Pa. It covers the whole side of a room and was built for $47,000. It is a marvel of elaborate and beautiful carving.

Mr. Marquand is the posessor of the costliest billiard table in the country. The price was $25,000.

J. W. Mackay furnished about $75,000 in weight of silver, and paid $120,000 for the work on his dinner service, which thus represents $195,000.

The costliest string of pearls in this country belongs to a New York lady and cost $15,000.

Another New York lady has a solitaire diamond ring for which she paid $48,000.

The late Mrs. Morgan paid $250,000 for her necklace.

Mrs. Hicks-Lord is the owner of a diamond necklace which cost $250,000.

The famous picture by Meissonier called "1807" was painted for the late A. T. Stewart. At the sale of his gallery, Henry Hilton bought it for $66,500 and presented it to the Metropolitan museum, where it now hangs, the costliest painting in America.

Sir Donald Smith is the posessor of the highest-priced painting in Canada, "The Communicants," by Jules Breton. Cost at the Seney sale $115,000.

W. W. Corcoran, of Washington, paid the highest recorded price for an American picture. It is Church's "Niagra," and the price was $13.000. It was reported that Legrand Lockwood paid $25,000 for Bierstad's "Domes of the Yosemite," but as at the distribution of his effects the picture brought less than $6,500 the first price was probably a fable.

In the Lenox library is a perfect copy of the Mazarin or Guttenberg bible, the first book printed with movable types. It is worth $25,000, and nothing better has ever been done since. Brayton Ives, of this city, has an imperfect copy, for which he paid $15,000.

J. F. Irwin, of Oswego, paid $10,000 for a bible. It was originally in three volumes, but by the insertion of woodcuts, manuscripts, engravings and etchings has been expanded to 60 imperial folio volumes.

Of the original edition of the sonnets of William Shakespeare, published by George Daniel, of London, in 1609, there are two perfect copies. One is in the British museum. For the other $6,000 was paid. It is a little book about 7 by 4 inches in size. A somewhat hardheaded clerk figures that it cost $480 an ounce.

A sixteenth-century vellum manuscript, with six paintings by Giulio Clovis, cost the Lenox library $12,000.

A Departed Editor's Reward.

An editor died and slowly wended his way down to where he supposed a warm reception awaited him. The devil met him and said: "For many years thou hast borne the blame for the many errors the printers made in the papers. The paper has gone for a dollar and a half and the $1.50, alas! has failed to come in. The printers have bedeviled thee for wages Saturday night when thou hadst not one cent to thy name. Men have taken the paper without paying for it, and cursed thee for not getting up a better paper. Thou hast been called a dead beat by passenger conductors when thou hast shown the annual pass to their envious gaze. All these thou hast borne in silence. Thou canst not come in here." And as he did so he murmered to himself, "Heaven is his home, and besides if we let him come in here he would have been continually dunning his delinquent subscribers, and thus create discord in my kingdom."

THE GREEN IN THE TREES.

In spring, when the green gits back in the trees,
And the sun comes out and stays,
And yer boots pulls on with a good tight squeeze,
And you think of yer barefoot days:
When you ort to work and you want to not,
And you and yer wife agrees
It's time to spade up the garden lot—
When the green gits back in the trees—
Well! work is the least o' my idees
When the green, you know, gits back in the trees!

When the green gits back in the trees, and bees
Is a-buzzin' aroun' agin,
In that kind of a lazy "go-as-you-please"
Old gait they bum roun' in;
When the groun's all bald where the hay-rick stood,
And the crick's riz, and the breeze
Coaxes the bloom in the old dogwood,
And the green gits back in the trees,
I like, as I say, in sich scenes as these,
The time when the green gits back in the trees!

When the whole tail-feathers o' wintertime
Is all pulled out and gone!
And the sap it thaws and begins to climb,
And the sweat it starts out on
A feller's forrerd, a-gittin' down
At the old spring on his knees—
I kind o' like jes' a-loaferin' roun'
When the green gits back in the trees—
Jes' a-potterin' roun' as I—durn—please—
When the green, you know, gits back in the trees!

HAIRBREADTH ESCAPES.

An Old Engineer Tells of Some of His Adventures.

An Unsuccessful Attempt at Suicide by a Man Now Prosperous—The Closest Possible Escape From a Terrible Collision.

Alderman De Witt C. Kellogg was not always a grocery man, or a politician, more than he has always been an Alderman. It has only been within the present year that that Alderman shied his castor into the political arena. For twenty years previously he was one of the most reliable locomotive engineers that ever leaned out of a cab window and raced over the earth from town to town, from county to county and from State to State.

The engineer Alderman sat in the Council chamber yesterday morning, entertaining a cluster of his brother-Aldermen with stories of narrow escapes during the years he was on the road. They were intensely interesting, as the speaker was full of animation and not at a loss for words.

"Coming into Detroit, and while approaching the Grand River avenue crossing," said he, "you can see down the street a long way. One day I noticed a fellow drive slowly toward the crossing. I tooted the whistle to let him know we were coming, and the fellow took his whip and touched up the horse with it. The horse was a fine-looking animal, young and full of life, and the buggy a new one, altogether a very handsome rig. The horse trotted faster toward the crossing and we were pounding along at a good speed ourselves. As we got closer I measured the distance and saw that if both of us kept up the same gait we would surely come together on the crossing. I jerked the whistle several times to warn him; he looked at us coming, but I'll be hanged if he didn't touch up the horse again. On we both raced, and about one hundred feet from the crossing I saw we were going to collide without a doubt. It was too late then to stop. Just as we dashed upon the crossing his horse swerved around, threw the buggy on the track in front of us, and the next moment buggy, man and horse were pitched crashing into the cattle guard and ditch. I stopped as soon as I could and backed up. The fellow was just crawling out of the wreck. His face was as white as his shirt-bosom. The horse was dead, with a spoke of one of the wheels sticking through his ribs. The man's hat—a big white one—lodged on the pilot of the locomotive. I pulled it off and handed it to him. His hand trembled so that he could hardly hold it.

"'Didn't you hear the whistle?' I asked him.

"'Yes,' he said, 'but I thought I could beat you across.'

"Now here is where the rub comes in. Railroad money seems to be regarded as prey for any body who can get it. A few weeks afterwards a gentleman called on Superintendent Blodgett. In case an engineer strikes any thing he is required to make out a written report of it, with full particulars. I had done so in this case. The superintendent's visitor stated that he had been struck by a Lake Shore train, his horse killed and his buggy smashed into kindling wood. He himself, fortunately, escaped with his life. The horse and buggy he estimated to be worth $350, and he came to see if he couldn't get a little something from the company for their loss. He was willing to come down to $250.

"'Did the engineer blow the whistle?' asked Blodgett.

"'No, he did not,' said the man. 'I can bring half-a-dozen people who will swear that the whistle was not blown.

"The superintendent called a clerk and sent for my report. He read to the man his answer to my question as to whether he heard the whistle or not, and then the clerk was directed to show the gentleman how the door looked on the outside. He went and the road was sued.

"A man who is now on the police force here," continued Ald. Kellogg, "had the closest escape from being cut into mince-meat that I ever saw. He got to drinking, then left his family and stayed away about a year. He was returning empty-handed and sorrowful when I saw him that day sitting on the end of a tie just the other side of the Rogue bridge. I was coming up from Toledo, my regular run, and was trying to make up fifteen minutes' time which we lost in leaving Toledo. There was a fifteen-mile stretch between here and Wyandotte in which we did not have to make a stop and the boys used to call it the race course. Well, I was booming over the race course at about forty miles an hour. When I saw this man, I blew the whistle and noticed that he looked around at us. Now, when a man looks at my engine I never pay any more attention to him as it may be presumed that most of mankind have enough gumption to leave the track and allow a locomotive to pass by without trying to molest it. As we neared the bridge, which was at the end of a curve, I noticed the fellow still sitting there and remarked to my fireman that I did not think he was quite clear. I blew again. Just as we rushed upon him what do you suppose he did? The —— fool threw himself backwards over the rail. Great God—that was all I had time to think of. You gentlemen, who may never have been on a locomotive under those circumstances can not understand the horror of the sight. But he was not killed—how did he escape? The heel of the pilot struck him and the next instant he was flying down into the swamp. We were going at such high speed that I think it was three-fourths of a mile before we came to a stop. I backed up and the fellow had crawled out of the mud and water and taken a seat on the other side of the track. I thought he was killed, you know. I suppose he was going to try it again with the next train. We loaded him into a baggage car and brought him to town. He let on that he could speak German only, and we could not get much out of him. There wasn't, though, a scratch on him.

"A year or so afterward," the Alderman went on as his auditors drew a sigh of relief, "a man walked up to my engine, down at Brush street depot, just as I was about to pull out. I was down on the ground looking the old machine over to see that every thing was all right.

"'How do!' he said.

"'How are you, sir,' I replied. He was dressed in a policeman's uniform. I didn't know him from Adam.

"'Know me?' he gently inquired.

"'I do not,' I said, 'you have the best of me.'

"'Well, I know you,' he said, as he walked up to the pilot and stooping down looked at it intently.

"'Well,' I said.

"'This is the engine that came near killing me—cutting my head off. This is the spot, I guess, which struck me,' and he pointed to the heel of the pilot.

"Recollection of the incident then flashed on me, and we had a talk about it. He said he did not have the heart to return to his family, and sat down there, having made up his mind to throw himself under the first train that came along. He got a start, somehow, braced up, reunited with his family and is now doing well and is happy. But he had a close call, boys, —the closest I ever saw. The tears came into the policeman's eyes as he stooped down and looked at the wheels. But old 235 never committed murder as long as I had hold of her throttle."

"Were you ever in a collision?" inquired one.

"Not quite," responded the engineer Alderman, "but I was once so mighty close to it that I measured the distance between me and the spot where I thought I should die. It is terrible—riding over the track with another engine and death staring one in the face a few yards ahead.

"I was running No. 4 out of Toledo," resumed the speaker proceeding to narrate the experience, "on the day when this happened. We usually waited at the wagon works for the Canada Southern, No. 9, if she was only a few minutes late, but if she was much overdue we would pull out and pass her up the road. Beyond the wagon works the road takes a sharp and rather a long curve, and No. 4 and No. 9 ran in opposite directions on the curve and on the same track. We were dead on time that day and number 9 was no where to be seen or heard. An engineer would have been put down as insane if he left the wagon works at that time without orders. I had a careful conductor. I received the signal to pull out. The conductor was on the other side of the train from me.

"Who gave that signal?" I asked my fireman.

"The conductor," he said.

"Sure?"

"Don't I know the conductor?" he growled.

"Well, I let 'er out, and away we spun. The train was made up of a baggage and mail car and two passenger coaches. Just before I let 'er go, I looked over towards the station to see if there was any signal out. If there was a red flag out, that was orders to back down on the side track and wait for No. 9. I saw no flag out and left, feeling positive that no flag was there. We were a few minutes over the schedule in leaving, and I pulled out the throttle with the determination to make up all of it as quickly as I could. I never thought of No. 9 after we left the wagon works—until about six minutes later there came an impression of the train that will last as long as I live. We were just humming along—the track was well laid though it was a curve, and there isn't any more danger to speak of on a good piece of curved track than there is on a straight away section. I sat on the inside of the curve, and inadvertently raising my eyes upon the track ahead, there she was!

"'My God, Jim,' I said to my fireman, 'there is No. 9.'"

"And she's flyin', too,' said Jim. 'What'll we do, Kell?' he shouted.

In a few moments she would be on us.

"Guess we'd better stay, Jim," I said, and without shutting her off I braced my feet against the boiler, threw her over and clapped on the sand and the air. This action reversed the drive wheels of the engine and set them running backward, while the other wheels of the engine and of the train ran forward. This greatly increased the resistance against the forward motion of the train, and is only resorted to by engineers when a crisis is imminent, as there is danger of blowing out the cylinder heads and otherwise straining the locomotive.

"Gentlemen," said Kellogg, "a steam engine on a railroad never looked so big to me before as that No. 9. Talk about the City Hall being big, why it was an ant hill to the size of No. 9's locomotive. I could see her old drivers spinning around on the inside rail of that curve. There was no time to blow the whistle until after I had reversed her. Galloway—Alex. Galloway was No. 9's engineer—saw me about the same time I saw him. What he did I don't know; I suppose he did the one as I, but this I do know, and that is that when those engines came to a stop the pilots were, by actual measurement, just eight feet apart. Alex. and I climbed down and shook hands across those eight feet.

"Of course I was overdue when we ran into Detroit," he continued "but it was not until I had looked over my engine, washed and changed my clothes that I began to feel the effect of my narrow escape. I broke completely down, and recollect walking into Superintendent Blodgett's office with my knees so shaky that they would hardly hold me up."

"Well, said I to Blodget, you've heard about it. Am I to blame?"

"Heard about what?" he said.

"O come, now; I know you know all about it—the narrow escape on the curve. Am I to blame?"

"I don't know."

"I'll take the matter in my own hands then, Mr. Blodgett. I resign, and you must get somebody else to take out my engine in the morning."

"Don't do that, Kellogg," said he, wait and see before you resign. You are excited now; you will think differently when you are composed.'

"No, sir," I said, "I know what I'm doing, and mean what I say. I didn't see any flag out at the wagon works. I have been on this road a good many years, Mr. Blodgett, and if there was a flag out there and I didn't see it, it is high time that I should resign before something serious does happen."

"This is a sensible way to talk, Kellogg," said he. "Now you think his matter over until morning, then you know."

"You see if I was to blame," explained Kellogg aside, "I did not want to give them an opportunity to discharge me."

"I concluded to investigate myself," said Kellogg, "and told the superintendent that I would call at his house at nine o'clock that night and inform him of my final decision. He said that would be satisfactory, and I jumped on a street car in the evening and rode out to West Detroit to intercept Galloway on his return to Detroit. Alex showed up all right and on time, though I could see that he was still a little shaky."

"'How is it, Alex?' I asked, climbing into his engine, 'was the flag out?' (He ran into Toledo right after I left, and would know whether the flag was out or not.)

"'No,' he said, "Kel, it wasn't!"

"I thought not," I said, "and that saves me. Where was Brown?"

Brown, the narrator explained, was the chief train dispatcher of the division and a very careful and reliable man. It was his duty to have the flag put out if he wanted No. 4 to side-track for No. 9. He had not done it.

"Where was Brown?" repeated Alex. "When I ran in Brown was in a dead faint on the platform and they were throwing water in his face, which was as white as a sheet, trying to bring him to."

Brown was checking off some cars to make up a train, a duty that was then imposed on dispatchers, and his brain being mixed up in the combination he forgot all about us for the moment and neglected to send out the flag. In the meantime I ran in and seeing no flag outsupposed the track was clear to the first siding and pulled out. A moment after I left Brown rushed out on the platform and cried.

"Where is No. 4?"

"There she goes around the curve," was the answer.

"Great God!" said Brown and fell in a dead faint on the platform. He expected there would be an awful slaughter in a few minutes more. He was powerless to prevent it and he knew that No. 9 was on that curve too.

"Did you resign?"

"No. I went around and told Blodgett that I had proved there was no flag out and would stay."

"Did Brown resign?"

"No; but he was laid off for ten days, then reinstated and some of the work taken off of him. An assistant chief dispatcher was appointed, whose duty was to look after the train lists. This was a concession that Brown had too much to do. Many accidents on the railroads are due to the overworking of the employes."—Detroit Free Press.

NEW USES FOR TAR.

How to Render Drains and Roofing Tiles Perfectly Water-Tight.

The coating of brick and wooden structures with coal tar, as a rough and ready means of preserving them from the action of damp, has been common from the earliest days of gas industry. It has also been usual in chemical works to protect the stones used in the construction of acid tanks, etc., by a preliminary soaking in heated tar. But the great improvement in strength and impermeability to moisture, which results from the simple operation of boiling bricks and stones in gas tar, is certainly not so generally known as it should be. Professor Lunge, in the new edition of his work, "Coal Tar and Ammonia," draws attention to the subject, and indicates several useful applications. He points out that drain and roofing tiles, which are quite porous and brittle as they leave the kiln, may be rendered absolutely water tight and much stronger by immersion in a bath of hot tar. Building stones are greatly improved by similar treatment; and for many purposes the dead black color which results is an advantage rather than an objection. The tar should be deprived of water and its most volatile oils; and to produce good results the bath must be maintained at a temperature of 100 degrees C. The articles to be treated should be thoroughly dried, and allowed to remain in the tar for some time.—Christian at Work.

Society at an Army Post.

One of the Irish laundresses at a Western post was evidently infatuated with army life, as she was the widow of a volunteer officer, and therefore drew a pension—a fact which proves that money could not have been the inducement that brought her back to a frontier post.

At one time she forsook her fascinating clothes-line, and went into the family of an officer to cook, but was obliged to leave from illness. Her place was satisfactorily filled, and when she recovered and came back to the officer's wife, she was told that the present cook had been engaged to remain, but that she might find a place with the wife of another officer.

It seems that the latter woman had also been a laundress at one time, and this the applicant well knew. Squaring herself off in an indescribable manner, she placed her arms akimbo and announced her platform:

"Mrs. Blank, I ken work for a leddy, but I can't go there. There was a time when Mrs. —— and I had our toobs side by side."—Tenting on the Plains

ADULTERATED LARD.

A Simple Test for Detecting the Presence of Cotton-Seed Oil.

The recent examinations of lard made at the Agricultural Department have resulted in the discovery of a test by which the presence of cottonseed-oil may be detected instantly by any dealer or housekeeper. The experiment is as follows: As much lard as can be taken up on the point of a case-knife is placed in a teacup. About a quarter of an ounce of sulphuric acid is poured upon it and thoroughly mixed with it. If the lard is pure, it will coagulate, and there will be a little difficulty in the mixing. If it is adulterated with cottonseed-oil and stearine, the mixture will take place immediately and easily. After half a minute, one-fourth of an ounce more of sulphuric acid should be poured upon and mixed with it. The whole process thus far should not occupy more than one minute.

The substance thus obtained is poured into a common test-tube, such as may be bought at any chemist's shop for a few pennies. The acid, somewhat colored, will sink to the bottom, and the fatty substance will remain on top. If the lard thus tested was pure, the color of the latter will be that of a light-colored sponge, changing in a minute or so to a dark cinnamon color. If it has been adulterated with cottonseed-oil, the color at first will be darker, changing immediately to a dark brown. These differences of color are so marked that no experience is required to detect them.

Cards might be printed upon which the colors produced by the sulphuric acid re-action for both pure and adulterated lards might be shown; and dealers, by using this test, may prove to their customers in a minute or two that the lad that they are selling is an unadulterated article. The experiment is simple, and the cost of it almost nothing. The novel thing about it is the placing of the mixture in a test-tube in which the acid may become separated from the fatty substance, thus making the test much more decisive and satisfactory. This was first suggested by Dr. Thomas Taylor, who has extended his experiments to a great number of different animal and vegetable oils.—Science.

A Lesson to Young Men.

Two young men and two young women attended the theater together in St. Louis a few evenings ago. At the end of the first act the young men rose and crowded their way out of the row in which they sat and disappeared in the refreshment-room. Their female friends were displeased by the maneuver, and one of them proposed that they should also leave and go home. The other thought it best to give the young men another chance. The clove-eaters returned, pushed their way back to their seats, and the play went on, but the young women showed less interest in their attentions. When the curtain rang down on the second act the young men again went out for more breath. Quickly the young women left the theater, took a cab, and went home. The young men, on discovering the empty seats, flushed in the face and straightway took their departure. It was a good lesson for them.—Chicago Times.

She has never had a "boom," but her growth has been and will be constant, vigorous and healthy. Property purchased this week is sure to be worth more money next week. With rich gold and silver mines on one side, good rich farming lands on the other, and the trade of Fort Meade with a garrison of a thousand men at her very door, she has an assurance of prosperity which falls to the lot of few towns. A PUZZLE.

There's one thing I don't understand;
It really seems to me so queer
That my mamma last night should say:
"Be sure and always mind, my dear;"

And when I got that dreadful fall
This very morning, from a chair,
Should pick me up and cuddle me,
And pat my cheeks, and smooth my hair;

And press her face down close to mine,
That I might hear her whisper, kind—
The while she kissed my tears away—
"There, there! my darling; never mind!"

PREFERRING ONE ANOTHER.

Mabel's Victory Over Self, and the Good Her Loving Words Accomplished.

"I choose the hammock."

"No, I want it."

"But I'm the oldest, so I'm going to have it."

"I'm the youngest, and you ought to give up to me."

"Well, I'm not going to this time, any how," and Mabel seated herself in the hammock with a determined air and commenced to swing back and forth.

"I'm going to tell mamma," said Bessie, in a tearful voice, turning toward the house; but as she did so she raised her eyes to her mother's window where the blinds were closed and the curtains drawn. Then she remembered that in that darkened room lay mamma with one of her dreadful sick-headaches, and she knew that at such a time she must not be disturbed in any way, for it always made her worse. Bessie couldn't see why mothers always had sick-headaches. Her mamma had them so often and Cora Lane's mamma did, too. It seemed very inconvenient and uncomfortable to her, particularly now when she had a grievance to tell. If she had known of the heavy throbs of pain that beat in the poor aching head, as the angry words were borne in through the closed blinds, she might have felt conscience-smitten, but she did not know, and she only paused and commenced boring her heel into the smooth turf of the lawn while a dark frown disfigured her usually bright little face.

She wished that she was bigger than Mabel, then she would show her what it meant to have an older sister who never gave up to her—that's what she would do. Bessie forgot then how often and how kindly Mabel yielded to her; it is so easy to forget kindness in the face of an injury.

Mabel lay in the hammock swinging gently to and fro, apparently perfectly contented, so Bessie knew there was no chance for her; and she saw her little white kitten walking about in the garden, springing now and then to catch some unwary fly or grasshopper. She cast one resentful glance at Mabel, then running toward the kitten she took it in her arms and commenced to pour her troubles into kitty's patient ears.

Mabel did not feel as contented as she looked, for she was really a very unselfish little girl, and gave Bessie the preference far more than was for her younger sister's good. But something was wrong that day; mamma had a headache, her door was closed and her curtains drawn, and there was no one to set things right. It was not really a desire to thwart each other that had caused the conflict between the two little girls, but it was that feeling of ruffled spirits that is known to us all, which grown-up people call nervousness in themselves, but in the little ones is too often designated as ill-temper.

Mabel, too, looked up at her mother's window. Poor mamma! How she did suffer when she had a headache! She thought of a time when she slipped into her mother's room and saw the pale face lying on the white pillow. She wished then that she could do something to ease the pain, and she wished it now with all her heart; but she was such a little girl, and knew nothing about sickness. As she looked down into the garden, and saw Bessie wandering about with the kitten in her arms, she wondered what she was thinking about. Was she angry with her for not giving her the hammock? She almost wished she had given it up, for she really did not care for it very much. But why should she always give up every thing to Bessie? She had some rights, even if she was the elder? Bessie never thought of giving up to her. And then like a flash it all came to her mind; how could she have forgotten!

For when they were both sick with scarlet fever, and Cora Lane, Bessie's dearest friend, sent her a beautiful red rose, she would not keep it by her bedside—only one little minute—but made mamma carry it to Mabel and insisted that she should keep it until it withered; and Bessie loved flowers so much, particularly red roses. She could never do any thing for Bessie, she was sure, that would be so sweet and self-sacrificing as that, and she felt very sorry now that she had not let her have the hammock. What was a hammock on a lovely summer day, when there were so many nice things all about her, compared with a beautiful, fragrant rose when she lay burning with fever in a darkened room?

"Bessie," she called, as she saw her sister moving aimlessly about with the little white kitten still held fast in her arms. Bessie turned at the sound of her voice. How small she looked among the tall dahlias and hollyhocks, and how forlorn!

"Come here, please," called Mabel, in a winning voice.

Bessie shook her head rather resentfully, but kitty was purring soothingly in her ear, and, after a moment's hesitation, she came slowly toward the big elm tree where Mabel sat in the hammock.

"Bessie," she said, rising from her seat, "you may have the hammock if you want it."

"I don't want it now," said Bessie, decidedly, in a tone which meant that she did want it very much, but she wished Mabel to understand that she was not to be made friends with so easily.

"I'll tell you what we'll do, Bessie," nothing daunted by her sister's repelent air; "let's sit in the hammock together and make a little nest for kitty between us. I'm sorry I didn't think of it before." Pussy purred with all her might, as though she understood and quite approved the plan, and Bessie's face brightened, but still she did not move.

"Come," said Mabel, who by this time had grown very enthusiastic, in her generous attempt to make peace, "you get in first with kitty while I hold the hammock."

Bessie could not resist her any longer, and the smiles broke all over her face as she ran to Mabel's side and said:

"No, sister, you sit down first, then I can climb in, and you may hold my kitty if you want to."

Bessie's forgiveness was slow in coming, but when it came it was whole-hearted and complete. It was the kind of forgiveness that also forgets.

So they sat side by side, and if you have ever sat with some one else in a hammock you know how very close together they were. There was not room between them for the little kitten, so she lay across both of their laps and they both stroked her soft, white fur, while they chatted merrily together; and kitty purred softly in a self-satisfied manner, quite as though she were the cause of this happy arrangement. And as the loving little voices floated in at mamma's window, a tender smile replaced the look of pain on her pale face, and soon she fell into a refreshing sleep, and when she awoke the headache was all gone.

Mabel did not know that, in her winning action toward her little sister, she had done any thing more than bring about a very happy state of feeling between themselves, and she would have been happier still if she had known of the relief that came to her suffering mother as she heard her loving words. This was not all, either; she had done something greater still for she had won a victory over herself, and "He that ruleth his spirit is; greater than he that taketh a c' "—Nellie Helm, in Interior.

Street and Roadside Shade Trees.

In no branch of rural economy, perhaps, are Americans so far behind the people of almost every country of Europe as in the selection, planting and care of street and roadside trees; and this is particularly true in the case of the plantations made in most of our large cities and their suburbs. So says our admirably-conducted cotemporary, Garden and Forest. Two mistakes are almost invariably made in undertakings of this character in the United States; the work is done too cheaply, and the trees are badly selected with reference to future effect. Saplings dug from the woods, with mutilated roots and branches, are planted in shallow soil, and are then left to struggle unaided against the enemies which beset urban and suburban trees.

There is no poorer economy than trying to plant trees cheaply. Unless the work can be done well it had better not be done at all. The ground should be thoroughly prepared, and well-selected nursery-grown trees, carefully pruned for the purpose, should alone be used. The American habit of taking saplings from the woods, cutting off all their branches and half their stems, can not be too strongly condemned. The result of such treatment is this: A fork is formed by two or more horizontal branches pushing up from the top of the stem. Water gathers and stands in this fork, and gradually carries decay down into the trunk of the tree, destroying it long before it reaches maturity.

In the matter of selection we make as many mistakes, and almost as serious ones, as in our methods of planting. It is a well-established rule, based upon common sense, that trees of one variety only should be planted on one continuous street or avenue. The reason is obvious. If trees of different varieties are used that uniformity essential in urban planting to the production of harmony of effect will be lost. Trees of different varieties grow differently. Some grow more rapidly than others; some, as they approach maturity, assume a stately and others a graceful aspect, and a variety which may make a country roadside beautiful is entirely out of place in connection with the formal lines of city buildings. This rule is rarely observed in the United States. Trees of one variety are rarely planted in continuous lines. The pendulous American elm alternates with the rigid-branched sugar maple, or a heavy horse chestnut is seen between two sprawling silver maples.—Rural New Yorker.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—Fruit on the table regularly will do much to counteract the craving for alcoholic stimulant.

—Never sun feather beds. Air them thoroughly on a windy day in a cool place. The sun draws the oil and gives the feathers a rancid smell.

—The farmer who by draining or extra manuring increases his crops may not for the time seem to be making any thing, but he is laying sure foundations for future success.

—To take rust out of steel rub the steel with sweet oil; in a day or two rub with finely powdered unslaked lime until the rust all disappears, then oil again, roll in woolen and put in a dry place, especially if it be table cutlery.

—The greatest inventions of the world were first conceived by the moderately educated classes, and the practical experience of a careful, observing farmer is often of more value than the costly experiments of highly educated professors.

—Charcoal roads have given good results. They are only of value in sections where timber is so cheap that it can be burned to get rid of it. The lesson for other sections to learn is that it will pay to cart the remains of a charcoal pits into the parts of the road that contain too much water.

—Some weeds provide pasturage when they are young and tender; hence a flock of sheep turned on a field infested with weeds will do good service in not only eradicating the weeds but in converting them into mutton. By preventing weeds from seeding they will soon become extinct unless they are of varieties that propagate from roots.

—Orange cake: Two cups of sugar, two cups of flour, one-half cup of water, a pinch of salt, the yolks of five eggs and whites of three, three teaspoonfuls of baking powder and the grated rind and juice of one orange. Beat the whites and add sugar for frosting, and the grated rind and juice of one orange. Bake the cake in layers and put frosting between.

—Hominy Drop Cakes: Stir the beaten yelks of two eggs into a pint of freshly-boiled hominy; if cold hominy is used heat it without adding water and stir up lightly with a fork to separate the grains; then stir in the beaten whites and salt as may be required, using less if the boiled hominy is already salted. Drop, with a tablespoon, on well-buttered tins and bake to a good brown in a quick oven."

—In this Western country, says Secretary Graham in the Industrialist, it is noticeable, as it is the world over, that the immigrant farmer who builds a small residence and a large barn, and always has both well painted, and every thing about his farm in good repair, will have, in time, a large house to live in and other red barns as well; while he who expends his surplus in an imposing house, and "knocks together" a few cottonwood poles and some slough grass for his stock shelter, will not get a second coat of paint on his house before the mortgage is foreclosed.

VALUE OF DRAINAGE.

How Land Is Beautified by Thorough and Practical Underdraining.

There are hundreds of acres sowed to oats and planted to corn every spring, that are spoiled in the cultivation because the land is too wet to till to good advantage; yet it is the best that can be done under the circumstances. You must go on whenever it is possible for the team to travel across it, or the field sowed in such a manner, put in when the ground is so soft that the harrow does not fill up the horse tracks, then followed by a hot sun that bakes a hard crust on the surface through which the air can not circulate freely. Indeed, when we consider the unfavorable conditions the plants have to contend with, it is surprising that we get the crops we do. Then let us look at a field that has been properly drained. The low spots are dry and fit to work as soon as the knolls. You can get on to work it easier and in better shape; the surplus water instead of lying on the surface until it evaporates, leaving the ground baked and the oats in a very sickly condition, goes through the earth to the channel provided for it, thus making innumerable little passages through which the air can penetrate and sweeten the soil. The drained land absorbs more heat from the sun; plants get the benefit of this heat and air; are healthier; grow better, and therefore give larger yields, and as a rule the growing season is considerably lengthened. This one advantage of getting oats sowed early, often makes all the difference between a poor and a good crop.

Another important point in favor of tile draining, in my opinion, is the greater benefit we derive from the manure applied, as compared with wet land not drained. It is the plan of most farmers in this locality to haul out the manure in the winter and early spring and spread it on the fields intended for corn. After the ground thaws out and before the manure is turned under, we generally have some heavy rains, and I am sure every observing farmer must have noticed (on wet lands) the streams of liquid manure running down the furrows seeking their way to the nearest water course, because the ground was full of water and there was no other alternative. In the case of the tiled land the water level is always on a level with the tiles, consequently when the manure is spread on the surface, that which the rain washes out and carries with it, must be nearly all left in the earth as the water filters through to reach the drains.—W. T. Bethune, in Ohio Farmer.

The only medicine for woman's peculiar ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded, is DR. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrappers, and faithfully carried out for many years.

THE OUTGROWTH OF A VAST EXPERIENCE.

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the INVALIDS' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

A BOON TO WOMEN. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar diseases.

A POWERFUL TONIC. As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the uterus, or womb and its appendages, in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic. It promotes digestion and assimilation of food, cures nausea, weakness of stomach, indigestion, bloating and eructations of gas.

A SOOTHING NERVINE. As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

A MOTHER'S CORDIAL. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system.

In pregnancy, "Favorite Prescription" is a "mother's cordial," relieving nausea, weakness of stomach and other distressing symptoms common to that condition. If its use is kept up in the latter months of gestation, it so prepares the system for delivery as to greatly lessen, and many times almost entirely do away with the sufferings of that trying ordeal.

CURES THE WORST CASES. "Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhea, or "whites," excessive flowing at monthly periods, painful menstruation, unnatural suppression, prolapsus or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation, and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

FOR THE KIDNEYS. "Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

TREATING THE WRONG DISEASE.

Many times women call on their family physicians, suffering, as they imagine, one from dyspepsia, another from heart disease, another from liver or kidney disease, another from nervous exhaustion, or prostration, another with pain here or there, and in this way they all present alike to themselves and their easy-going and indifferent, or over-busy doctor, separate and distinct diseases, for which he prescribes his pills and potions, assuming them to be such, when, in reality, they are all only symptoms caused by some womb disorder. The physician, ignorant of the cause of suffering, encourages his practice until large bills are made. The suffering patient gets no better, but probably worse by reason of the delay, wrong treatment and consequent complications. A proper medicine, like DR. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION, directed to the cause, would have entirely removed the disease, thereby dispelling all those distressing symptoms, and instituting comfort instead of prolonged misery.

3 PHYSICIANS FAILED. Mrs. E. F. MORGAN, of No. 71 Lexington St., East Boston, Mass., says: "Five years ago I was a dreadful sufferer from uterine troubles. Having exhausted the skill of three physicians, I was completely discouraged, and so weak I could with difficulty cross the room alone. I began taking Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and using the local treatment recommended in his 'Common Sense Medical Adviser.' I commenced to improve at once. In three months I was perfectly cured, and have had no trouble since. I wrote a letter to my family paper, briefly mentioning how my health had been restored, and offering to send the full particulars to any one writing me for them, and enclosing a stamped envelope for reply. I have received over four hundred letters. In reply, I have described my case and the treatment used, and have earnestly advised them to 'do likewise.' From a great many I have received second letters of thanks, stating that they had commenced the use of 'Favorite Prescription,' had sent the $1.50 required for the 'Medical Adviser,' and had applied the local treatment so fully and plainly laid down therein, and were much better already."

A VOICE FROM CALIFORNIA. Mrs. ED. M. CAMPBELL, of Oakland, California, writes: "I had been troubled all my life with hysterical attacks and paroxysms, or spasms, and periodical recurrences of severe headache, but since I have been using your 'Favorite Prescription' I have had none of these. I also had womb complaint so bad that I could not walk two blocks without the most severe pain, but before I had taken your 'Favorite Prescription' two months, I could walk all over the city without inconvenience. All my troubles seem to be leaving me under the benign influence of your medicine, and I now feel smarter than for years before. My physicians told me that I could not be cured, and therefore you will please accept my everlasting thanks for what you have done for me, and may God bless you in your good work."

Later, she writes: "It is now four years since I took your 'Favorite Prescription,' and I have had no return of the female trouble I had then."

Retroverted Womb.—Mrs. EVA KOHLER, of Crab Orchard, Neb., writes: "Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has done me a great deal of good. I suffered from retroversion of the uterus, for which I took two bottles of the 'Favorite Prescription,' and I am now feeling like a different woman."

Doctors Failed.—Mrs. F. CORWIN, of Post Creek, N. Y., writes: "I doctored with three or four of the best doctors in these parts, and I grew worse until I wrote to you and began using your 'Favorite Prescription.' I used three bottles of it and two of the 'Golden Medical Discovery,' also one and a half bottles of the 'Purgative Pellets.' I can do my work and sew and walk all I care to, and am in better health than I ever expected to be in this world again. I owe it all to your wonderful medicines."

Well as I Ever Was.—Mrs. JOHN STEWART, of Chippewa Falls, Wis., writes: "I wish to inform you that I am as well as I ever was, for which I thank your medicines. I took four bottles of the 'Favorite Prescription' and one bottle of your 'Discovery' and four bottles of the 'Pellets.' All of the bad symptoms have disappeared. I do all my own work; am able to be on my feet all day. My friends tell me I never looked so well."

SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1888.

At the time of going to press Thurs- day we had no news from the Na- tional Convention which would indicate the nominees.

The St. Louis Convention is mor- ally indictable for conspiracy against American interests and American labor. It has deliberately organized a plot to ruin both.

The star-eyed goddess of Free- Trade has been formally endorsed. She now regards herself as a bigger girl than the Goddess of Liberty, and it will take her until November to find out that she isn't.

It will take a bigger life-preserver than Allen G. Thurman to reach around the waiste of Grover Cleve- land and float him safely through the coming storm. You can't float an elephant with a champagne cork.

In September, 1886, Judge Thur- man said to a party of visitors: "I am only waiting for the grim ferry- man to row me over the Styx." The venerable old man has had to wait until now for the selection of his oarsmen.

The Rochester, New York, Union is a strong Democratic sheet, yet it is getting disgusted at the effort to drag Mrs. Cleveland into the coming campaign on her husband's behalf. It says:

This dragging of petticoats into politicts — this pantomimic-hippo- promic exhibition of a woman upon the stump for the purpose of influenc- ing the votes of men must present to the mind of every right-thinking person a degrading spectacle, to say nothing of the insult it gives to the intelligence of the people.

The Washington Post, Democratic, talks right out in meeting about the nomination of Thurman. It says:

He is necessary now. Too old in 1885 to be secretary of State, too weak and infirm in 1888 to be either associate justice or chief justice of the Supreme court, he is still strong enough in 1888 to run the gauntlet of a Presidential campaign, and quite young enough to be inaugurated Vice President in 1889.

Verily the stone which the build- ers rejected has become the head of the corner.

Hon. Binger Herman, the Repub- lican Representative from Oregon, while the House was discussing the free lumber clause of the Mills bill on Tuesday, in a speech referred to the Oregon election of the previous day. He told the House that the campaign was conducted solely upon the issue of the Mills bill and the fa- vor it would show to chinese labor. He said that the Democrats had turned every stone possible to secure success, so as to get an indorsement of their tariff bill, and that they met such a Waterloo as they never en- countered before. St. John and other Prohibitionists were turned into the canvass by the Democrats, with a view to diverting Republican tem- perance voters to the Prohibition ticket. The Mills bill was given a fair and free test at the polls, was overwhelmingly defeated, and he predicted that the entire North would follow Oregon's example. The indi- cations all point in that direction, most certainly.

The Boston Journal discusses the question, "Do we want Mugwump votes?" in the same spirit that should prevail at the National Convention at Chicago. Its answer is both "no" and "yes"—the former as regards the of- fensive free-trade mugwump faction, and the latter as to the other indepen- dent voters. Its remarks are well worth reproducing. It says:

If the question means, Do we want the mugwump free-trade vote enough to be willing to weaken or abandon the Republican principle of protec- tion, we answer emphatically, No. The Republican party does not re- gard the existing tariff as a fetich too sacred to be disturbed. It perceives the evil of the surplus and the neces- sity of revision; but it insists that such revision as is necessary shall be made in harmony with the protec- tive principle, and in such a manner as to avoid the disturbance of indus- tries and to sustain the prosperous condition of American wage earners. No gain in votes which could be had by surrendering this principle or diminishing the emphasis placed up- on it could compensate for the dis- grace of the surrender.

But if the question relates to the independent voters who, for other reasons than attachment to free- trade, voted with the Democrats at the last Presidential election, but are still in most of their opinions more Republican than Democratic, we an- swer frankly, Yes. We do want their votes, and hope to have them in the coming contests. There were a great many of these voters who were de- ceived by Mr. Cleveland's voluble professions of reform purposes, and taking up hastily with the notion that he was "better than his party," helped to make him President, only to find that his promises were made but to be broken, and that the Dem- ocratic spoilsmen were in full con- trol.

These voters are angry and disap- pointed. It will be hard for them to vote again for the man who has broken his pledges, and who stands as the representative of the party whose character and principles are precisely what they were when their votes were given against it. Why should we not make it easy for these men to return to the party in which, by their sympathies and opinions, they belong, and to vote for the Re- publican candidates next November? A strong ticket and a good platform will win thousands of such voters, and hold thousands more who might be alienated by a mistaken policy.

A Voice on the Tariff.

PITTSBURGH, PA., June 13.—The Amalgamated Association placed itself on record to-day on the tariff question. The Tariff Committee ap- pointed several days ago has been carefully weighing the matter before drawing up any resolutions, and at the forenoon session of the Conven- tion they were presented. They were received with general favor and some slight changes were made in them. The corrected resolutions are as fol- lows:

WHEREAS, There has been intro- duced and now under discussion be- fore Congress a bill known as the Mills bill, for the reduction of the present tariff on customs, and there- by put a check on the prosperity of our beloved country in favor of for- eign countries, especially England; and whereas, we as workingmen know that any reduction on the present tariff would menace the wages of those who earn their living by the sweat of their brow; and whereas, there is joy among the ill- paid workingmen of Europe, joy among the members of the English Cobden Club because they hope to obtain control of the market of this Republic; therefore, as representa- tives of the iron and steel workers of the United States in convention as- sembled, representing New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Wisconsin, Ala- bama and other States in this Union, be it.

Resolved, That we are in favor of the sentiment, "America for Ameri- cans" native and natura'ized, and we endorse the words of Daniel Webster, who, 51 years ago, said if the people can obtain fair compensation for their labor they will have good houses, good clothing, good food and the means of educating their children. Labor will be cheerful and the peo- ple happy.

Resolved, That in our judgment the citizens and industries of this country cannot be protected in any better way than by placing a protective tariff on all articles imported from other coun- tries that can be produced by our own people, in order that those who pro- duce them may be better able to de- mand that to which, as citizens and upholders of this government, they are justily entitled to—an equitable share of the profits of their toil to maintain their families in decency: that they may be able to educate their children and teach them, as they advance toward manhood, to de- fend the principles of our system of government.

Resolved, That we are most em- phatically opposed to any reduction of the present tariff, and hereby ex- press our unqualified condemnation of the provisions of the Mills bill, believing as we do that its adoption as a law would be detrimental to the interests of the American working- men, and we respectfully call upon our representatives in Congress to vote against it.

Cleveland and New York.

St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The parties in New York were so evenly balanced in 1884 that the Democratic plurality was just 1,047. In no State has Mr. Cleveland de- clined so much in popularity in the past three years as he has in New York. But apart from the antagonism to him of thousands of those who gave him their support in 1884, the number of new voters who will join the party of his opponents this year will undoubtedly be great enough to give the Republicans a safe majority in the Empire State.

A Political Flop.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., June 18.—The Evening Sun, a Bourbon Demo- cratic paper, will appear as a Repub- lican morning daily on Tuesday morning. It has secured the Asso- ciated Press franchise of the late Commercial. The paper has been a free-trade, Bourbon Democratic sheet. The same editors have pledg- ed themselves to support the Repub- lican candidates and preach tariff doctrine.

It is Cleveland, who is alleged to be stronger than his party, who killing it. The following extrac from a letter written by a gentlema of one of the interior counties Kentucky are significant. The writ says:

"I was raised a Jackson Democr have voted for ten Presidents, a never voted for a Republican Pre dent in all my life, but if the Dem crats adopt Cleveland's views on t tariff question at St. Louis, I sh certainly vote for a Republican t time. I am one of those farmers th the Mills bill is trying to help alo by making wool, sugar, hemp a flax free. I say the farmers are n looking at it in that light in this sec tion, and next November's electio will show it."

The Handkerchief Campaign.

New York Paper.

A novelty mannfacturing firm o Spruce street has commenced the manufacture of tens of thousands of handkerchiefs bearing the Stars and Stripes of the Union. They will be elaborately gotten up in fine muslin and lawn, and are to be distributed as an offset to the red "wipes" of the Democracy. On Friday next a great order of these goods will be shi to Chicago, where they will be sold as souvenirs of the Republican con- vention. The Stars and Stripes will be the emblems of '88 for the Repub- licans.

How Cleveland Lost Hs Hed and Indiana.

Even the Mugwumps intersperse their expressions of continuing ser- vility to "Boss" Cleveland with oc- cassonal references o his solemn pro- testations against a second term and mildly mutter their feeble regrets and disappointments. But if the Mugwumps were logical they would see that Mr. Cleveland could only se- cure the Democracy by throwing ov- erboard all his pledges to the Mug- wumps, that about a second term in- cluded. The Mugwumps seem too much dazed to realize the fact tha they have been thrown overboar and that Mr. Cleveland, in order t run for a "first term" as a Democrat had to become a Democrat and t make tolerably near a "clean sweep" of the Republican officeholders.

It was then that he became auto crat of his party and so far lost h head in consequence, that he ha made Indiana a Republican State, by throwing overboard Indiana's candi- didate for Vice-President. Did he thus disdainfully treat the Indian Democracy because they resented his boorish treatment of Mr. Hendricks, the Idol of the Indiana Democracy? Whatever the motive, Mr. Voorhees plainly notified the assembled De- mocracy in St. Louis that the Presi- dential treatment of Indiana's candi- date had made Indiana sure for the Republican nominees. Mr. Voor- hees has not forgotten, and the rest of the Indiana Democrats have not forgotten, that Mr. Cleveland stolidly unfeelingly and, in disregard of all considerations of ordinary propriety, refused to attend the funeral of Mr. Hendricks and aggravated the offense by pretending to be afraid of assassination!

Enough Indiana Democrats will remember this and o her irritating displays of Autocrat Cleveland's ill- will, jealousy and bad temper to- ward Mr. Hendricks, to prepare a political funeral for Mr. Cleveland, next November, by staying away from the polls. Much stranger po- litical retributions have punished ar- rogance and folly in high places.— N. Y. Mail and Express.

Republican Confidence.

Try as they may, Democrats can- not disguise from themselves the fact that the Republican party this year is better organized and more hopeful than it has been for years be- fore, and that there is good ground for its confidence. It is not only united on the leading issues before the people, but is thoroughly aroused at the threatening danger to Ameri- can interests, and will make the most vigorous and aggressive fight this year that it has ever done since the election of Grant.

Never before were the men who earn their living by the sweat of their brow so seriously menaced. Never before were farmers and manufac- turers so thoroughly in earnest in a palitical campaign. Never before were the agents of foreign interests so impudent and determined in their efforts to invade our markets with the products of pauper labor, and to break down American industries. Never before were the Southern bal- lot-box stuffers and intimidators so open and defiant in their frauds upon a free ballot. Never before have the adherents of a treasonable cause been honored and rewarded above the country's loyal defenders by a Fed- eral administration. The people are alarmed at the possibilities of anoth- er term of Democracy, and are only waiting the opportunity to avert the threatened dangers with their votes.

It is therefore easy to explain why the friends of protection and a free ballot are so active and hopeful. There is much at stake.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, June 18, 1888.—Senator Sherman was asked if he considered ex-Senator Thurman a strong man before the people. His reply was "No, I do not. The only elective office that he was ever a can- didate for was the governorship of Ohio, and he was then badly defeat- ed by Rutheford B. Hayes." This will doubtless be new to many peo- ple. For if one may judge from the amount of gush printed about Thur man in some of the Democratic news- papers, many supposed him to be a kind of popular idol, when the fact is, that he has never held the very smallest elective office, in fact never received but one nomination, and was then defeated. He would never have been put on the ticket with Cleveland if it had not been found necessary to put him up to head off Gray of Indiana, who was particu- objectionable to Cleveland.

A joint resolution has been passed by Congress granting leave to all persons in Government employ, who participated in the battle of Gettys- burg, to attend the re-union in July.

The Senate has passed a bill appro- priating $1,500 to place a bust of the late Chief Justice Waite in the Su- preme Court room.

On motion of Senator Stewart a resolution has been passed by the Senate, instructing the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the Senate the names of all parties who have offered to sell, and the names of all parties of whom bonds have been purchased since April 1, 1888.

An attempt was made Friday night to hold a Cleveland and Thur- man ratification meeting in this city. The attendance was very small and the enthusiasm was entirely lacking, notwithstahding the fact that red bandannas were plentifully distributed around the hall.

The Government Printing Office investigation is at last over. There will be two reports; the Democrats will condemn the methods of Bene- dict's Republican predecessor, and commend those of Benedict. The Republican report will not waste any space or time in defending a dead man, who was unable to defend him- self during the investigation, and who is beyond punishment no mat- ter how guilty he might have been, but will plunge at once into the mis- management of the present Public Printer, as proven by his own wit- nesses, and rumor says the report will recommend his impeachment.

About one third of Congress is in Chicago, but the routine business is moving quietly along. The regular appropriation bills are taking up the most of the time. It will require some quick work to get all the regu- lar appropriation bills through by July 1, the beginning of the fiscal year.

Mr. Blaine will sail for this coun- try July 9, and immediately upon his arrival, so he writes to a friend in this city, he will take the stump for the nominee of the Chicago Conven- tion. He will speak wherever the national committee may think his services are most needed.

Further consideration of the Fuller nomination has been postponed until the 5th inst. Likewise the fisheries treaty.

Ex-Senator McDonald and Wm. H. English, who was the Democratic nominee for vice president in 1880, called on Cleveland Friday, doubt- less to receive his congratulations on the neat manner in which they killed the Gray boom.

Senator Chandler proposes an in- vestigation into the peculiar election methods in vogue in the State of Louisiana. The Senate has an op- portunity before accepting the cred- entials of Senator Gibson, who has been re-elected to the Senate by the legislature, to get to the bottom of some things that are certainly pecu- liar if nothing worse.

The spot where John Quincy Ad- ams fell in his fatal illness in the old hall of the House of Representatives, now known as statuary hall, is to be marked by a bronze tablet on which is inscribed "John Q. Adams, Feb. 21, 1848." This is around the rim of the tablet, and in the centre is the word "Here."

Chicago is the magnet toward which we are all drawn this week, but the character of the members of that convention is such that all Re- publicans are willing to trust them, feeling sure that whatever is done will be the proper thing, as well as the best, and that "Vim, Vigor and Victory" will be the result.

General Sheridan who has been slowly improving for several days, is again worse, and fears of his death are once more expressed on all sides.

Girls in China are believed to have no souls, and to kill them is not mur- der. In this country some girls are believed to have no hearts, but if a jilted young man was to kill one of them, the law would make as much fuss as if she had a heart as big as a water bucket.

Review of Trade.

NEW YORK, June 15.—R. G. Dun & Co.'s review of trade for week end- ing Saturday, June 16, has this:

The moderate improvement in trade noticed a week ago does not yet seem to be more than the slight reaction which occasionally breaks a period of uncertainty and comparа- tive inactivity. The signs of a last- ing improvement in trade do not yet appear. Uncertainty still prevails and buyers are conservative, confin- ing their transactions to immediate wants in most branches of business. In some, moreover, the cold and wet spring has so far curtailed trade that retailers are carrying over stocks larger than usual. There is uncer- tainty about the tariff and its effect upon many branches of manufacture, about the crops and the foreign de- mand for exportable products, about transportation rates in the near fu- ture, and about financial prospects.

Crop prospects have not changed for the worse, but the extent of the loss in a winter wheat is more defi- nitely realized, while the prospects as to spring wheat and other crops are necessarily vague. With favor- able weather the general results would probably be fair in some quar- ters a decidedly hopeful feeling be- gins to prevail. Want of confidence in the future is the prevailing tone in all the markets. This cannot be at- tributed to financial influences, for money is overabundant, and quoted at 1 per cent here notwithstanding the renewal of gold exports. The treasury has raised its prices paid for bonds taking a large amount of the day, but the only considerable efforts since have been $2,000,000 at an eighth above its new limit for fours and a like amount three-eights above the limit for 4½s. There is a growing impression that bonds will not be forthcoming at acceptable figures as it becomes important for the treasury to make large disbursements.

The iron trade manifests no im- provement, though the sales of 39,000 tons of steel rails are reported for $30 at the mill and the allotment is said to be disregarded by some Eastern makers. Southern pig is quoted at $17 for No. 1, but the quality is not in all cases found satisfactory. Bar iron is weaker with $1.75 to $1.80 quoted for large lots of best refined.

In the dry goods business there is a lack of activity and yet in cotton goods a more confident feeling with print clothes higher at 3.87 and low grades of bleached goods very firm. Woolens are still dull with very good transactions for men's goods, and wool is quoted lower at Chicago.

Emperor of Germany Dead.

POTSDAM, June 15.—Emperor Fred- erick III, of Germany, after a reign of three months, died at eleven o'clock this morning. His death was daily expected for the last week. An hour after migdnight this morning the Empress dismissed the members of the imperial family to their apart- ments; and prepared herself to pass the night watch in a room adjoining the sick chamber of the Emperor. Dr. Hovell shared in the vigil. At this time the Emperor was in the full possession of his faculties. Shortly after one o'clock he wrote on a slip of paper the following questions, which he handed to Dr. Hovell: "How is my pulse?" "Are you satisfied with it?" He then wrote something more, but retained the piece of paper in his hand after erasing the words. Between two and three o'clock his breathing became terribly labored, and some moments of struggle would occur, alternating with spasms and great distress, as the hard fight with approaching death progressed. By this time the strength of the dying Emperor was seen to be waning. As soon as it be- came evident that the end was near, the Empress caused the royal family to be summoned. At 8 o'clock all gathered around the bedside. Dr. Koegel, court chaplain, who had been summoned by telegram from Ems, did not arrive in time to ad- minister the last sacrament. Dr. Persius, therefore, officiated in this ceremony. Pastor Kogge was also present in the death chamber. Dur- ing the administration of the sacra- ment, and indeed even to within fifteen minutes before his death, the Emperor appeared to be quite con- scious. He showed by the expres- sion of his eyes and by the move- ments of his eyelids that he still recognized all who approached the bedside, relatives and others. A number of officials, who had been summoned early in the morning, reached the palace before death had taken place. Among those present at the time the Emperor died were Count von Stolberg-Wernigerode, Gen. von Albedyll, Count Enlen- berg, Gen. Rauch, Count Radolin- Radolinski, Gen. Pape and Gen. Lindequist.

There is a fortune in store for the milliner who shall devise a bonnet that can be worn in any part of the church and always present its trim- med side to the congregation.

The Harper's Ferry Mill Case.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA., June 16.— The famous Harper's Ferry mill case, which has been in the United States Court so long, has been decided by Judge John J. Jackson. The plain- tiff in the case was the Harper's Fer- ry Mill company and the defendant Thomas H. Savery. An effort was made by plaintiff to prevent the de- fendant from completing a larges pa- per mill, already under way, upon the Shanandoah. The plaintiff claimed ancient rights of waterway, which the defendant, by building his mill, would materially interfere with. After a long contested litiga- tion the decision was in favor of Sav- ery. This decision effectually dis- poses of the Harper's Ferry Mill company.

HOMŒOPATHY. — 3077 patients were treated at Ward's Island Hos- pital, N. Y., in 1876; the death rate was 6.07 per cent and the cost of med- icine 43½ cents. During same year 5,651 patients were treated at Bellvue Hospital, N. Y., with death rate of 12.03 and cost of medicine per patient $1.46. At Ward's Island the treat- ment is Homœopathic, at the last it is not. Surely these official figures should open peoples eyes to the folly of ignoring Homœopathy, the only school of medicine in the world on the Rock of Natural Law, on which alone, humanly speaking, life and health are safe. If local drug- gists cannot supply our Homœpathic medicines--not "specifics," mind— send name for a copy of our Cata- logue and Index and order desired medicine by mail. BOERICKE & TAFEL, Homœopathic Pharmacists, 212 W. Fayette St. Baltimare, Md., 938 F. St., Washington, D. C., or 1011 Arch St. Philadelphia, Pa. Business established in 1835.

Dealers who have job lots of old bandanas will find that this is the time to unload. The articles will be fashionable for a short time only.

A Minister's Wife and Family Pounded.

MR. EDITOR:—Some of the people of Deer Park came to the home of the U. B. Pastor, in Deer Park, on last Friday evening, June 15th, and right into his house without being invited and took charge of his house, gave his wife and family an unexpected and undeserved good pounding with flour, meat, coffee, sugar, rice, butter, fruit, dress patterns, money and many other good things we might mention. Now I do not know what other people may say or think about such treatment to a preacher's wife, but I know it was undeserved and a good pounding. We shall not forget them for such treatment soon. We hope and pray God may abundantly reward them both in this world and in the next for so doing. N. A. K.

SWANTON, MD., May 23d, 1888.

EDITOR REPUBLICAN:—In your issue of March 24th, I notice you give place to a valuable article on "Practical Forestry." It is hard to realize here in the best timbered portion of our country east of the Mississippi, that there is any likelihood of timber being a valuable crop in the near futuee, but the U. S. Commissioner of forestry is good authority for the statement that "there is not enough timber now growing in the United States to last at its present rate of consumption until another crop can be grown." Many of the railroad companies are seeing this and setting out hundreds and hundreds of acres of catalpa.

Allow me to mention some of the more valuable kinds. As noted above the catalpa speciosa grows rapidly, and is very durable for posts or rails. Russian mulberry is also a quick growing durable timber for such purposes. Of our native trees locust and and cestnut should always be encouraged; hickory and white ash are much used for mechanical purposes, but there is probably no quick growing tree as profitabe as the black walnut in ground at all suitable.

As to evergreens nothing grows more rapidly nor is more valuable, than white pine. Norway spruce is good and hemlock spruce makes an excellent wind-break. It is now just the right season to set evergreens, and what would make a farm more handsome or sell better than a row of white pines around every field to which the wire for fencing could be secured, to say nothing of their benefit as wind-breaks. Count up the number you could thus set on your farm at one rod apart—say 1,000 black walnut or white pines—and that they could be cut every 33 years, which is equivalent to 30 every year. Even at present prices they would bring you more than you make off of your entire farm. "You would never get any benefit?" If you sold your farm in May would you get no more for it if there were several fields of wheat making fine growth? Most certainly; and the above varieties grow rapidly. Mr. C. T. West says his mills now are often on ground that he cut over about twenty years ago.

This spring I am setting 500 each of the following: White pine, Norway spruce, hemlock, catalpa, Russian mulberry and black walnut. All timber should be close enough to grow tall, thinning out as required, and evergreens set shallow and the roots not allowed to become dry for they have a resinous sap which will not circulate after it has become hardened.

Basket Pic-Nic.

There will be a basket pic-nic held at Mason's School House, Saturday, June 30th, 1888, by the Sundy school. Good speaking and music. At night there will be a grand display of fire works. The public are cordially invited to attend. Come one, come all and enjoy the day.

LININGS.

"Nay, nay, dear child, I can not let you slight
Those inner stitches on your gown's fair hem
Because, you say, they will be out of sight,
And no stern critic will discover them.

"You do but build a most inviting hedge,
Behind which falsehood and deceit may lurk.
When you embroider fair the outer edge,
And to the inner give no honest work.

"The silken chain of habit which you wear
So lightly now upon your careless youth
Will strengthen strand by strand; then have a care!
Else it may throttle the sweet soul of truth.

"I hold that every stitch untruly set
Weaves a soiled thread along your web of fate;
And each deceitful seam may prove a net
To hurt and hinder, trust me, soon or late.

"Ah, dearest child, on everything you do
Let the white seal of honor stamp its grace.
Keep all your soul as clean with Heaven's dew
As the pink flower of your tender face.

"God makes no clumsy linings. Mark this bloom!
A fairy's glove;' and though it grieves my heart
To send the smallest blossom to its tomb,
We'll tear the dainty little glove apart.

"In this and every flower that we behold,
From crimson robe to pansy's purple vest,
God sews the velvet on the inner fold,
And makes His linings fairer than the rest.

"Is it not perfect, from the slender stem
To the brown dapples on the curling rim?
God folds not carelessly the foxglove's hem;
Then try, my little child, to be like Him."

AN ELEPHANT'S TRACK.

An Account of the Pinson Family's Trip to the Circus.

"I kin be done, Nance, an I'm a-goin' to do it ef it busts me." Newt Pinson brought the forelegs of his raw-hide-bottomed chair down on the puncheon floor with a thump, and slapped his knees emphatically with his hairy hands.

"Five dollars air a mighty heap to spen' fer sech foolishness, Newt," replied his wife, turning the squalling baby over on its stomach and pounding it vigorously on the back. "Mo'over," she added, after a pause, "I don't see ez ye be got the five dollars, nohow."

Mr. Pinson stretched out one long leg and thrust a hand into his trousers pocket. "Ye're mighty right, Nance, I 'ain't," he admitted, blowing the loose tobacco from the handful of coin fetched up from the honest home-made depths; "I've got jes three dollars and a half lef' outa what Sam Leggett paid me fer the yearlin.' But me an' the children hev been a-talkin' of it over, an' they hev conclusioned to th'ow in ther aigg money; Dan fo' bits, an' Pete fo'; Joe an' Jed hez two bits betwix' em, an' Polly M'riar say ez how she hev fifteen cents. I'm lackin' of a dime, but I reckin I kin scratch thet up somewhers."

"Ther's my two bits up yan in the clock," Mrs. Pinson remarked, with pretended indifference; "ye kin take that ef ye air sech a plumb fool ez to pike the whole passel of us inter town to see the circus."

"Shucks, Nance!" he returned, indignantly; "I ain't a-goin' to tech yo' two bits." Nevertheless he got up and fumbled about in the clock case on the high mantel-shelf until he found it. "Anyhow," he added, as he reseated himself, "I kin pay it back whence ye git ready fer ye' nex' bottle o' snuff."

"Will they be a el'phant?" demanded one of the freckle-faced urchins gathered round the heads of the family, listening, breathless, to the discussion.

"A dollar fer Nance, an' a dollar for me," Mr. Pinson counted, gravely, taking no notice of the interruption, "an' fo' bits apiece fer Beck an' Dan an' Pete an' Polly M'riar an' Joe an' Jed. Children half price"—he glanced casually at the flaming circus poster tacked against the chinked wall in the chimney corner—"not countin' of the baby. An' fifteen cents left, by jing!"

"Do ye reckin I kin git in fer half price, paw?" This question, which came from Becky, the oldest of the Pinson brood, who stood five feet six and a half inches in her bare feet, might have been meant as a bit of covert sarcasm, had not the eager voice belied any such intention. Her father's eyes traveled slowly up from the hem of her homespun frock, as she stood leaning against the chimney jamb, to her pretty round face framed in its shock of frizzly red hair. "Waal, I be dinged, Beck!" he exclaimed, in dismay, "I keep fergittin' ez how ye air growed up! His face clouded, and he looked ruefully at the pile of dimes and half-dimes lying in his large palm.

"An' Sam Leggett's gone to Kansas on a cattle drive," murmured the twelve-year-old Dan, with a meaning leer at Becky. A vivid blush overspread her face; she dropped her eyelids and squirmed her shapely toes, But Mr. Pinson was absorbed in a mute recalculation, which ended presently in a beat-out whistle and a mournful shake of the head.

Mrs. Pinson, with the colicky baby laid over her shoulder, was jolting her rockerless chair to and fro, and singing, in a sweet drawling undertone:

"Far-ye-well, oh, far-ye-well:
When ye git to hev-ven ye will pa-art n-o-o m-o-o'!"

She interrupted herself to observe, quietly: "Ye kin tote the baby, Beck; an' I kin tote Joe; an' yo' paw he kin tote Jed, twel we git inside the tent. They ain't no charge for children in arms. It says so."

"Lord, Nance!" exclaimed her husband, in an ecstacy of admiration, "ye air the beatenes' white woman on Rastler's Creek! That settles it oncet mo'! Fetch me a coal fer my pipe, Polly M'riar."

Becky heaved a deep sigh of relief, and sank down on her heels, reaching under her mother's chair at the same time for the snuff bottle.

"Will they be a el'phunt?" persisted Jed, the tow-headed boy next to the baby, already in long trousers, which were hitched up to his shoulders with a single white cotton "gallus."

"Of co'se. They is al'uz a el'phunt with a circus," replied his father.

"I 'aint nuver seen no circus," said Mrs. Pinson, in jerks between the long-drawn swells of her mournful lullaby.

"Nuther hev I," admitted Newt, "but I jes natchly know that ever' circus has got to hev a el'phunt an' a clown."

"Didn' I tell ye so!" cried Dan, triumphantly, following with a dirty forefinger the head-lines of the poster. "Ain't the el'phunts right here, a dancin' an' a stan'in on they heads, an' a-rollin' o' barrils! An' ez fer clowns' they is four mirth-pro-vo-king clowns in this here show. It says so. An' five beau-ti-ful and ac-com-plished lady bare-back riders;" and he continued to spell out laboriously the manifold and unrivaled attractions of Riddler's Mammoth Circus and Menagerie, billed—for one performance only—in Johnsburg at two o'clock p. m., Monday, the 18th of October. Come One. Come All.

Becky, struck by a sudden thought, stared at him, shifting the brush uneasily from one corner of her mouth to the other. "Like ez not," she broke out, abruptly, "Brother Skaggs 'll preach agin it nex' Sunday. She's yo' bawn, Brother Skaggs air a-goin' ter preach agin it."

Mrs. Pinson stopped singing; Polly Maria and the boys turned stricken faces upon their father.

His eyes twinkled under their bushy red brows, but his voice was decorously sober as he drawled: "Brother Skaggs hev gone to Confunce, an' he won't be back twel Sat'day week. Ye min', Nance," he continued, "it air thirty-one mile to town, an' ef we lay to git ther in time fer the show Monday, we got to camp somewhers 'bout Jim-Ned Creek Sunday night."

"Jes to think o' me goin' to town oncet mo'!" said Mrs. Pinson, meditatively, that night, when she and Becky were getting supper in the brush arbor behind the cabin. "I 'ain't been sence you was a baby, Beck. Yo' paw an' me went to Wash Dingwall's infair—he died with his boots on four year ago; an' Tempunce Loo—thet's his widder—she's married agin to Bijy Green. I rid behin' him, an' he toted you on his lap. Townfolks air mighty bigaty," she added, warningly; "'n' ye mus' do up thet pu'ple culiker o' yourn, Beck, an' put on yo' shoes an' stockin's."

"Seems lak fo' days won't nuver go," fretted Beck, "an' ole Baldy air sho to lame his se'f, or sump'n'. It's alluz that a-way whence a body are plumb set on doin' a thing."

But the four days did go, and when the eventful Sunday afternoon came, old Baldy, unusually sound and spirited, was with Jinny, the gaunt gray mule, harnessed to the wagon; the patched and dingy cover was drawn over the bows, a bundle or two of fodder and a few oars of corn were thrown into the hinder part, and Mr. Pinson drove gayly alongside of the rail-fence in front of the cabin. The rickety house door was drawn to with a rock behind it to keep it shut. A couple of chairs were handed up for Mrs. Pinson and Becky, and they clambered in with the baby. The yellow cotton poke, well stuffed with corn bread and bacon, and the battered coffee-pot and frying-pan, were stowed under the chairs. Polly Maria and the boys sat on a quilt spread over the sweet-smelling fodder; Rove, Ring and Spot, the lean, long-eared brown hounds, yelped and whined against the wheels.

They jolted away, serious, as became a perfessin' fambly on a Sunday, but full of inward excitement. At night they camped on the pecan-fringed banks of Jim-Ned, and were off betimes in the morning. But not too soon to find the roads lively with friends and acquaintances from all the settlements around, bound on the same joyous errand as themselves. They passed Joe Holder, with his wife and sister-in-law and the thirteen children of the two families, creaking along in a huge freighter's wagon drawn by five yoke of gaunt, wide-horned oxen; they were overtaken and outstripped by a noisy squad of girls and young men on horseback from the Fork Valley neighborhood; they kept within hailing distance for a dozen miles or more of old Daddy Gardenbrier and his wife, riding double on their blind yellow mare. The Mount Zion folks, they heard, were ahead of them by some hours, and an impatient youngster who trotted by on a paint pony threw over his shoulder the information that the Big Puddle lay-out was coming on behind.

"Lord, Nance!" Mr. Pinson exclaimed more than once that morning, "I wouldn't of took five dollars to of staid at home."

"Nuther would I, Newt," Mrs. Pinson as often returned, with a kind of solemn delight on her thin, sallow face.

The long reaches of post-oak "rough" were heavy with sand; the shinn-oak prairies between were a tangle of roots that zigzagged across the road, and made progress slow and painful; the abrupt banks of the frequent "dry creeks" were steep; the October sun was hot; and by noon old Baldy had become utterly dispirited. He had, moreover, fallen a little lame, and he moved dejectedly along by Jinny, who long ago had flopped her big ears downward in sign of weariness and discontent.

The Pinsons under the dingy wagon cover were well nigh speechless with impatience.

Suddenly Dan stood up, knocking his head against the low wagon bows. "Jes over yan," he declared, "pas' one little bit o' shinn-oak prery, an' crost a dry creek, an' up a hill, is town." Dan had been to town once with Sam Leggett to lay out his long-hoarded egg money in a four-bladed knife and a pair of store suspenders.

Polly Maria, slim and thin-legged, standing up beside him, pitched backward into the fodder as the wagon came to a sudden halt behind a group of dismounted horsemen, who, with their bridles over their arms, were squatting down, apparently searching for something in a half-dried mud-puddle to the right of the road. "Hullo, Jack!" called Mr. Pinson; "what ye lost?" One of the men looked over his shoulder. "Hy're, Newt? Howdy, Mis' Pinson?" he cried, springing to his feet and coming back to the side of the wagon, where he shook hands all around. "We 'ain't lost nothin'," he went on, putting a foot upon the hub of the front wheel and resting his arms on the hot tire; "we done found sump'n', though, you bet! A genooine el'phunt track in the sof' mud yander, plain ez daylight, an' no mistake."

Polly Maria and the boys scrambled in hot haste over the tail-board. Mr. Pinson threw down the reins, and held the baby while Becky and her mother jumped out.

"Wish I may die ef it ain't a el'phunt track sho!" he exclaimed, when he had joined the wondering circle gathered about the huge footprint.

"It looks to me lak ez ef it were hind-side afore somehow," said Mrs. Pinson, timidly.

"I have just been explaining to Mr. Jack Cyarter here and these other gentlemen, madam," said Mr. Tolliver, the old Virginian who taught the school at Ebouzer Church, "that it is a fact in natural history that the track of the elephant always presents that appearance." He removed his hat as he spoke, and made an old-fashioned courtly bow.

"Ye don't say!" murmered Mrs. Pinson, over-awed.

Jack Carter and his friends mounted their horses and dashed away, followed at a more sober pace by Mr. Tolliver on his slab-sided plough-mule.

The Pinsons climbed back to their places and jogged on, across the bit o' prery and over the dry creek—where they came near getting stalled—and up the hill. On its crest Newt Pinson involuntarily drew up. "By jing! this beats me!" he ejaculated, with widening eyes. The square at the foot of the slope was in an uproar. Horses stood nose to nose around the court-house fence, and were hitched to the scraggy mesquit-trees that shaded the town well. The dusty streets leading away from the plaza were blocked with wagons little and big, carts, ambulances, dilapidated hacks, high-swung, red-bodied stages—every imaginable kind of vehicle—and all the intervening spaces as well as the irregular sidewalks in front of the four infacing rows of stores, were alive with men, women and children, who elbowed one another, whooping, laughing, gesticulating—surging about in a state of the wildest, best-natured excitement. Beyond the unpainted little Baptist church, on the further side of the square, the circus tents were visible. Flags and streamers were flying from their poles, and a vanishing burst of music came floating from them up to the top of the hill.

"This beats me!" ejaculated Mr. Pinson again. With a deep-drawn breath he gathered up the ragged, homespun lines and drove down into the square, picking his way dexterously through the crowd until he halted alongside the shaky platform in front of Bush Gaines' store. "Hollon agin, Newt—that you?" grinned Jack Carter from behind the counter within, where he was helping himself to a plug of tobacco. "Ye're jes' a minute to late to see the percession. It air certain a fine show. The el'phunt were ther', mighty nigh ez big ez Ebenezer Church. An' seech a clown! You'd a laughed yo'sef to death to 'a seen him. His breeches air mor'n a yard wide, an' he 'aint got a hair on his head!"

"Ef we hadn't of stopped to look at the el'phunt's track—" began Newt, regretfully; "but nuver min', Nance, it air a heap better to see it fust off fum the inside."

"O, a heap better," responded Mrs Pinson, with cheerful alacrity. Bush Gaines, measuring off some jeans for a Mt. Zion matron, called to Newt to bring his fambly in the sto' an' set down, an' pass the time o'day. But after a brief consultation with his wife, during which Becky took mental note of some town girl in looped overskirts and bangs—an observation which bore fruit at the next Quarterly Meeting—Mr Pinson declined with thanks, and drove on to the town well—all but gone dry from the excessive strain upon it—where Daund Pete watered the team.

Afterward they crossed the square, stopped by the Baptist church, in full view of the circus tents, whence arose at this moment a prolonged and sullen roar. "They're feedin' of the nannnuals," exclaimed Mr. Pinson, in a familiar, off-hand sort of way, whereat Mrs. Pinson shuddered and hugged the sleeping baby closer to her bosom.

Old Baldy and Jinny were unhitched and fed from the trough at the back of the wagon; the panting dogs laydown in the shade of the church; the children had a snack all around out of the yelow poke, and Becky and her mother fetched out the chairs and sat down to "have a dip."

"It air a haffn hour yit twel the do's is open," said Mr. Pinson, finally. "Jes ye an' the childern stay right here, Nance. I'm goin' to tramp down to the pos'-office an' git the las' 'leefon news, an' sich. I'll be back the minit air time, an' min' all be ready, lessn we don't git no seats."

Mrs. Pinson nodded, and he strolled away. "This here beats me," he kept saying to himself. Johnsburg was indeed in an unwonted state of excitement. Riddler's was the first circus that ever quitted the line of railway and ventured across the long sandy reaches of post-oak rough to the little isolated town in West Texas. And the whole surrounding country had pulled to its doors like he Pinson's, and responded to the invitation of the huge posters: "Come One. Come All."

Newt's progress was slow, owing to the frequent encountering of neighbors and the necessity of inquiring after the halth of their families. He did at last, however, reach the post-office, a ram-shackle building next to the blacksmith shop. As he turned the corner he came upon a cake-and-lemonade stand. His hand went instantly down into his pocket, and came up with te extra fifteen cents, which he exchanged for three solid slabs of mahogany-colored gingerbread. "Fer Nance an' the children," he explained, as the woman in charge wrapped up his purchase. The bleary oil creature looked at him with a sudden kindly smile, and slipped a stick of peppermint candy into the parcel.

With one foot on the post-office step, he paused to look at a man who had opened a gigantic yellow umbrella out in the dusty square, and, standing bareheaded beneath it, was yelling some unintelligible argon at the top of his lungs. Mr. Pinson hurried over and joined the ring of gaping spectators. On a bit of board in the shadow of the umbrella a couple of odd little marionettes of colored metal were circling in a kind of grotesque waltz. "Lots of fun for twenty-five cents!" shouted the showman, stooping now and then to touch up the figures with a stubby forefinger. "Lots of fun for twenty-five cents! The greatest toy invented in this age or any other. So simple that a crawling child can not fail to manage it! Those who know the trick will please say nothing. Cheap, gentlemen, for twenty-five cents. O, I see the gentleman is going to buy!"

Newt grinned and shook his head regretfully.

"One for one, two for two, three gets the half-a-dollah!" bawled another individual who had set a table near by covered with wooden nine-pins. Jack Carter and his crowd were throwing at these with little painted balls. A cigar, Jack explained to Newt, was the reward for one pin knocked down at a throw; two cigars went to the player who knocked down two; while the lucky thrower who succeeded in knocking down three received fifty cents. "One for one, two for two, three gets the half-a-dollah," went on the proprietor monotonously. "Three throws for five cents. Step up, gentlemen, and try your luck! For a nickel! One for one, two for two, three gets the half-a-dollah!"

"Lord! ef I hadn't of bought this durned ginger-cake!" groaned Mr. Pinson in spirit, gathering the paper-parcel more securely under his arm and moving on with the crowd.

A step or two brought him to an open wagon from which a patent-medicine man was holding forth. "Try the remedy," he whined, flourishing a stout black bottle and a pewter spoon. "Cures all diseases! Try the remedy! Administered free of charge to any one in the crowd. This superb bottle filled with the remedy only fifty cents. The wise man tries, the fool dies. Try the remedy!"

"This here beats me," murmured Newt, mechanically wiping the perspiration from his forehead, and backing against the court-house fence, where he leaned fairly exhausted with the variety and novelty of his emotions. "The haffn hour must be nigh 'bout up. Dinged of I ain't glad," he continued, letting the crowd drift on without him to where the health-lift man was exhorting the cautious ranchmen to "try the machine, try the wonderful machine, gentlemen. Excellent for the constitootion! Only five cents a trial. Try the machine," and the reckless cowboys were emptying their pockets at the invitation of the vender of the prize-boxes.

"Curious game that, sir," said a smooth voice at his elbow. He looked around, startled. A seedy but respectable-looking personage was standing by him with his arms crossed on the low fence. He jerked his head as he spoke toward a little knot of men hanging around the stile-steps leading into the weed-grown court house yard.

Newt walked over and looked on. It was a simple-enough-looking game at cards. An innocent-faced little fellow with black hair and curly mustache was manipulating the greasy deck. The bet was five dollars. Two countrymen, unknown to Newt, with suspiciously stiff white collars above their coarse hickory shirts, and scrupulously clean finger-nails, won successfully five dollars, and the dealer much chagrined, seemed on the point of giving up.

Newt made half a step forward. His heart was beating violently and the blood was surging in his ears. "I'm a perfessin' member," he argued mentally, with himself, while the cards were once more shuffled and spread out, "yit it air jes 'bout the easies' thing in creation to tell which one of them cyards air the right cue. An' Nance an' me'll hev mo'n time to trade out the five dollars whence the show air over. Shucks!"

And he counted out and laid down his handful of dimes and nickles, and hazarded a bet. He bent forward eagerly, and unconsciously stretched forth a hand. "This here monty air a mighty deceivin' game," remarked the blacksmith, with an air of conviction, as the dealer raked Mr. Pinson's money into his own pocket and walked jauntily away.

Newt turned about, half dazed by the suddenness of the whole transaction, and bewildered by the jeers of the by-standers. Just then, however, a noisy burst of music from the circus tents gave the signal for the opening of the doors; a wild rush immediately began in that direction, and in a few moments the square was deserted, except by the patent-medicine man and the owner of the big umbrella. These joked each other loudly and slapped significantly their silver-weighted pockets.

Newt passed them with his head bent, heedless of the sneering laugh which they sent after him. As he approached the church he saw that Becky had the baby; she was holding him up and smoothing the pink calico skirts over his fat white legs. Mrs. Pinson looked at him with an unwonted sparkle in her solemn black eyes as he drew near, and lifted the chunky Jed in her arms. 'She looks lak she did whence I war a-courtin' of her," he thought, with a sore pang. Joe plunged toward him with a sudden whoop. "Hurry, paw, hurry!" screamed Polly Maria, "we ain't a-goin' to git no seats lessen we hurry." He put Joe aside roughly and strode on to his wife. His face was set hard, though his mouth twitched convulsively.

"Lord-a-mighty, Newt Pinson, what ails ye?" ejaculated Mrs. Pinson, letting Jed slip from her arms.

"Nothin' ain't ailin' me ez I knows on," he returned, in a dry, harsh voice; "we got to go back home 'thout seein' o' the show, thet's all. I done bet away every cent of ourn an' the childern's circus money on a fool game o' cyards—yander. O Lord——" he ended with a groan. A single wild wail burst from Polly Maria and the boys. Then they huddled against their mother's skirts in mute agony.

A faint flush passed over Mrs. Pinson's thin face, and the light faded from her dark eyes.

"'Tain't no diffunce, Newt," she said, lightly, catching the baby from Becky's limp and nerveless arms. "Jes ye hitch up, quick ez ye kin, an' le's get outn this here bigaty town. Me an' the childern air plumb beat out wi' these stuck-up townfolks, anyhow!"

Newt stared at her in silence, and slouched away. Her gaze followed him to the rear of the wagon; when he was beyond the reach of her voice she whirled around and blazed in a threatening half-whisper: "Ef ary one o' ye says a word to yer paw 'bout this here misfortin o' hisn, or 'bout hankerin' a'ter the show; or ef ary one o' ye ain't thet gamesome an' lively lak ez ef they wa'nt no sech a thing ez a circus, or a clown, or a el'phunt in this here livin' worl'—sho's ye bawn I'll shet the do' in Sam Leggett's face an' cowhide the balance o' ye twel ye can't set down fer a week!"

Becky's ruddy cheeks grew pale. "Yes, maw," she returned in a subdued tone.

"Yes, maw," echoed Polly Maria and the boys, stolidly, not without squeezing back some ungamesome tears, however, as they stood in a row against the Baptist church and watched their father bring around Jinny and old Baldy.

Had they only known it, they might have seen, while they waited, the Lilliputian Lady and the Fat Woman go by in a shaky hack with torn curtains, and descend before the painted flaps of one of the side shows. But they did not know.

The wagon was turned around; they climbed over the wheels and settled themselves under the dingy cover. As they moved slowly across the silent square a tremendous shout from the spectators within the tent, and a pompous fanfare from the brass band, announced that the Grand Entry had begun.

Newt stalked along beside the tired team downcast and miserable. "I've even fergot wher' I lef' the childerns' ginger-cake," he muttered to himself, as his mind went over and over the incidents of that fatal halfn hour.

A curious hilarity prevailed that night around the little camp-fire. Mrs. Pinson, usually silent almost to taciturnity, had become all at once loquacious. She painted to the family-circle in glowing colors the pride and wickedness of town-folks; she pictured the denunciatory wrath of Brother Skaggs when he should learn that perfessin' members of Siloam Church had been inside of a circus tent; she related the experience of sundry sinners who had been overtaken by divine vengeance while in the very act of laughing at the antics of the clown; she even lifted up her voice and sang some particularly flame-and-brimstone promising hymn tunes. Becky, mindful of Sam Leggett away off in Kansas, seconded her efforts to keep the general cheerfulness up to a proper pitch. If it showed signs of flagging, however, a warning look, shot from beneath their mother's drooping eyelids, acted like a charm on Polly Maria and the boys.

Newt, who sat mournfully hugging his knees at first, and gazing into space, presently caught the infection himself, and when, finally, he unrolled a patch-quilt and threw himself thereon, closing his eyes in peaceful slumber, it was almost with the conviction that the five dollars had been well lost in keeping a perfessin' fambly out of the worldly and soul-destroying circus tent.

Mrs. Pinson, sitting alone by the smouldering fire with the baby in her arms, looked at his unconscious face upturned in the dim moonlight; her gaze traveled slowly from one muffled, indistinct form huddled under the shadow of the wagon to another; she sighed heavily, and her face relapsed into its usual somber expression. "I wisht—" she muttered; then after a long pause, as she stretched herself on the quilt beside her slumbering spouse and wrapped the baby's feet in an old shawl, she concluded with a little touch of triumph in her whispered tones: "Anyhow, I hev seen the el'phunt's track!"—*M. —To keep flannels as much as possible from shrinking and felting, dissolve one ounce of potash in a bucket of water and leave the fabric in it for twelve hours. Next warm the water, with the fabric in it, and wash without rubbing, also draw through the water repeatedly. Next immerse the flannel in another liquid containing one spoonful of wheat flour to one pailful of water, and wash in a similar manner.

TEMPERANCE READING.

A WICKED SPIDER.

I know a dingy corner where a wicked spider clings;
Where he spins his web round bottles, glasses, jugs and other things;
And I listened in the shadow as one day I passed along,
And I heard the wicked spider, as he sang his cruel song:

"Will you take a little cider? Will you call while passing by?"
Said the wicked, crafty spider to the buzzing little fly.
"Will you take a little lager? Surely you will not decline
Just to take a drink for friendship; say, just sip a little wine."

"He is coming for his cider!" said the wicked, cruel spider;
"He is coming for his wine, and my cord shall round him twine;
While he sits and sips his lager, I will whet my little dagger,
And when he has drunk his wine he will find that he is mine!

Ha! the little fool is coming, I can hear him buzzing, humming;
Ye who comes to visit me, vainly struggles to be free."

"Ye are welcome to my parlor; I am glad to see you come,
But not stay outside the entrance; please to make yourself at home.
Will you take a little lager while I sharpen up my dagger?
Will you take a drop of wine? then you surely shall be mine;
I will bind you, I will grind you, though you struggle, weep and pray;
I will tie your hands behind you, you shall never get away;
I will fight you, I will smite you, I will stab you, I will bite you,
I will make you poor and needy, I will make you old and seedy,
I will make you bleared and bloated, with rags and tatters coated,
And your hat will look so shocking that the boys will all be mocking;
I will haunt you till you die, then I'll hang you up to dry!"

O my boy! beware of cider, and of lager, and of wine,
Then the wicked, cruel spider ne'er shall get a child of mine.
Let us storm his ugly castle, let us tear his web away;
Let us drive away this spider. Heaven in mercy speed the day!

HIS WILL PARALYZED.

Terrible Experience of an Habitual Drunkard—His Downfall, Ruin, Resistance and Final Cure.

In a recent number of the Westminster Review a reformed "habitual drunkard" unbosoms himself in an article whose dark and dreadful pictures recall the weird dreams of the opium eater. Although the writer fails to give his name, he is evidently well up in the social circles of Great Britain, while the high character of the Review is a sufficient guaranty of the genuineness of the narration.

After telling of his many and disastrous yieldings to the terrible appetite for alcohol, which had deprived him of position after position, the repeated warning of friends, and his own efforts to escape from the demon of drunkenness, the author describes the abject powerlessness of the habitual drunkard:

"The habitual drunkard, however, is powerless to regard all warnings. His conscience may be as keen as his remorse is great. He may earnestly long and strive to do what he knows to be right. He may even be strong-minded in all that concerns the business of life, save in one particular failing; but, as De Quincy says of the opium-eater: 'His intellectual apprehension of what is possible infinitely outruns his power, not of execution only, but even of power to attempt.' He lies in sight of all he would fain perform, but is powerless as an infant, and can not even attempt to raise. He drinks, not because he likes drink, or likes to get drunk. He often detests the one, and shudders at the thought of the other; but he drinks because he has an uncontrolable and morbid impulse to swallow intoxicating liquor. He may surround himself with every conceivable restriction, but in vain, as I shall show in the sequel; until at length the restless turbidness that is one of the punishments of habitual debauchery paralyzes all the efforts of a decrepit will, and he ceases to think seriously on the subject. He does not dare to think on it, for if he do it produces a melancholy that sends him all the sooner to drink again."

Thoroughly alarmed by the realization of his own powerlessness, the writer threw himself at the feet of eminent physicians and social reformers to plead for help. But like the friends who had warned him before they could give him no hope but in total abstinence by the exercise of his own "resolute will" and the forsaking of former companions.

"My experience, however, teaches me," continues the author, "that haunts and companions have little to do with leading the dipsomaniac to the fatal cup; although good companionship has a great influence in keeping the convalescent away from it. As a rule the habitual drunkard avoids companions, drinks in solitary communion with his own bitter thoughts, building castles in the air, cursing every glass he drinks, and inwardly resolving that each particular debauch shall be his last. When, too, he turns away from his old haunts it is to discover new and perhaps more enticing ones. The glittering gin palaces stares him in the face wherever he turns his eyes. The publican is everywhere. It is the same to-day as it was in 1408, when Hoccleve wrote:

"'The outward sign of Bacchus and his lure,
That at his doore hangeth day by day,
Exciteth folk to taste of his moisture.
So often that man can not well say nay.'"

Nevertheless the drunkard does not despair. On the advice of physicians he surrounded himself with the most stringent restrictions. "I have often left home for London," he says, "a distance of five miles with no more money in my pocket than would purchase a railway ticket for the return journey, so as to make it reasonably impossible to buy drink. What has been the result. 'The outward sign of Bacchus and his lure' has been too much for me. I have preferred to walk both journeys in order that I might drink my money." Hunger and fatigue and isolation are no protection to the drunkard.

"On one occasion, during my terrible sojourn in a continental city already referred to, I was three days without food. Nothing passed my lips but water, and my head was full of thoughts of suicide. On the fourth morning I discovered in my pocket-book five cartes-postales. I sold them for eight sous, intending to buy bread with the money, and surely, one would think, my circumstances and condition were sufficient to prevent any miscarriage of my intention. But on my way to the boulangerie I came to a wine-shop, and three sous went for a glass of vin rouge; a second wine-shop took other three sous, and I must now believe that had I possessed still other three sous they would have been similarly spent, but as the remaining two sous would not purchase drink they were invested in roasted chestnuts. I have known similar occurrences in regard to other persons; and the advice to avoid old haunts and evil companions, however well intentioned, is therefore of little or no avail to a dipsomaniac.

Of the methods of cure advised there remains then but the "effort of the will.

"But the effort of the will is a physical phenomenon, and is not entirely under the control of any man. It obeys fixed laws. Its strength or its weakness consists of the impulses which act upon it. There is a limit to its power. It is even conceivable that it alone may be a constant quantity at a time when other impulses of the brain are not. At any rate it is but a movement of nervous matter, and the proper strength and direction of that movement depends upon a healthy condition of the brain. The use of alcoholic stimtiant (it has been proved) destroys that essential condition. The toxic agent acting upon the brain changes its organic composition and deteriorates its functions. There is a weakening of the controlling power of the higher brain centers, a pollution by alcoholic poisoning of the source whence flows the dictates of the will. Indeed, there are structural alterations of the whole nervous system until at length the nervous batteries become so feeble that not only is there no spontaneous overflow of nervous power, but no discharge whatever, and the will is paralyzed. When such is the case, every motive for prudence and restraint, all the force of dear-bought experience is as nothing compared to the craving for drink. The sense of the most lasting interests does not move the will so strongly as does the relish for stimulants. The determination to have acts with far more energy than the determination not to have. To a man in such a condition the advice of his friends, his own knowledge and experience, his surroundings, all motives for sobriety are as naught."

Continuing, the writer describes his voluntary confinement in a retreat as the last resort to escape the allurements of the open saloon. Dipsomania, he concludes is as much a disease as fever, and the one can only be prevented as the other, by avoidance of the cause. The cure lies in the prevention of any possibility of contact with the cause of the disease, or if such contact has taken place, in abstinence till the craving dies out for lack of sustenance. How long is such abstinence necessary?

"The question is a difficult and intricate one. The only rule that can be laid down is that there should be time for the morbid conditions to wear out or, as Dr. Alfred Carpenter expresses it, 'until the time arrives at which all the tissues of the body have been changed, and a new tissue laid down in its place.'"

Finally says the writer:

"The foregoing experiences establish to my mind two propositions; (a) that dipsomania is a disease of the mind, due to physical causes, the victims of which are incapable of managing themselves or their affairs; and (b) that total abstinence from alcoholic drinks for a prolonged period is essential in order that a cure may be effected."

GOOD REASONS.

Why You and Every Other Man Should Sign the Pledge.

"I'm not a drunkard."

"I don't drink any thing to speak of."

"If I want a drink I take it; if I don't I let it alone."

"I never take so much that I don't know what I am about."

"I can drink little or much; it never hurts me."

"I can drink or let it alone."

"Why should I sigh the pledge?"

Because:

1. You don't want to be a drunkard. I never found a man who did; and the disappointment of men who wake to find themselves drunkards is something too terrible to take the slightest chance on, and a pledge of total abstinence taken and kept will turn any man or woman from the path of the drunkard and the shame it leads to, and hedge him in with sobriety just as effectually as a good barbed-wire fence will turn a careering colt from all that lies outside of its paddock, and keep him within his own place.

A deliberate promise is the strongest tether with which any man can bind a good purpose. You have a purpose to be sober, reliable, pure; then bind the habits of your life to it with a solemn promise to abstain from intoxicating liquors, including wine, beer and cider, and you are safe from that dragon.

2. You should sign the pledge and stop all use of intoxicating drinks, because if you drink it ever so moderate you are in danger. The subtle poison of alcohol has just one way with human blood and nerves and brain, and if you take one glass to-day of light wine, the chances are ten to one that you will die a drunkard. You will follow in the same road that is filled up with the staggering, profane, unclean throng of drunkards who all began just as you are doing, drinking the one first glass which opened the gate to all that has followed of shame and sorrow.

3. You should sign the pledge, even if you never touched a drop of alcoholic drink, that your name and influence may be on the right side of the question. If you have a boy or girl, that you may lead your child in the right way. As citizen, for the sake of the tempted and weak who need the strength which would come to them from your name on the pledge; as a member of society, that the social world may sooner adopt the fashion of purity; as a man, that every other man and woman may know just where you stand, and that no one shall dare to call your position in question.—Mrs. S. M.I. Henry, in Union Signal.

In his sermon on a recent Sunday, Bishop Fallows, of Chicago, said of the saloons: "The saloon is the enemy of the laborer, the corruptor of youth. It has no moral standing in any community. We asked the City Council to take a short step in the direction of restricting this evil. We did not wish the saloon to be within whispering distance of our churches and schools."

Who can measure the damage the liquor traffic entails on homes and families, the moral injury it works, the soul-ruin of which it is the source? Surely it is time for thoughtful men to devise some alleviation or remedy for this gigantic burden.—Christian Intelligencer.

—A citizen of Volo, Ill., claims to have discovered a peculiar phenomenon in the woods in Fremont, Lake County. As described by him, it consists of the natural ingrafting of a burr oak tree upon a white oak. The burr oak leans against the other from the ground up, and is dead. The dead trunk, however, seems to go right through that of the living white oak, and the branches of both varieties of tree, all green and vigorous, mingle together in about equal proportions.

—Cultivated in groves, the average growth in twelve years of several varieties of hard wood has been ascertained to be about as follows: White maple reaches 1 foot in diameter and 30 feet in height; ash, leaf maple or box elder, 1 foot in diameter and 20 feet in height; white willow, 18 inches and 40 feet; yellow willow, 18 inches and 35 feet; Lombardy poplar, 10 inches and 40 feet; blue and white ash, 10 inches and 25 feet; black walnut and butternut, 10 inches and 20 feet.

—An astonishing experiment may be performed with no apparatus but a piece of string five or six feet long. A person's hands being held over his ears, this string is passed around his head by another person, who holds both ends in one hand, and by drawing the fingers or nails of the other hand over the cord produces upon the tympanum of the subject impressions of almost startling intensity. Sharp peals of thunder, changing into a distant and prolonged rumbling, are effects that may be readily given.

WHAT CONSCIENCE DOES.

A French Murderer Voluntarily Gives Himself Up to Justice.

Charles Dickens in "Martin Chuzzlewit," and Erckmann-Chatrian in "The Polish Jew," have depicted the case of criminals who preferred surrendering themselves to justice rather than to longer endure the feeling that they were being hunted down like wild beasts, but such a case of conscience has actually happened here in Paris. This same feeling has just driven a murderer to give himself up to the police after they had hunted for him in vain everywhere. A poor devil named Cornu killed a dealer in birds at the little town of Saint Maur, and then he wandered over the face of the earth in company with a man whose acquaintance he had picked up on the road. The two made no long halts at wayside inns, they avoided towns and villages, slept under hedges or in such sheltered corners as they could find, and they made long detours to dodge the gendarmes. In this way they crossed four departments; occasionally they were noticed and were chased by gardes champetres, who perhaps knew instinctively that they were suspicious characters on whom it might be well to lay their hands, and, although they managed to escape arrest, they had the fear of it constantly upon them, and the specter of the guillotine was ever before their eyes. Perhaps, too, remorse, or at least regret for a useless crime, hung heavily on Cornu, murdering his sleep just as it did that of the successful Macbeth. Finally the two tramps arrived safely at the frontier and stepped across into Belgium. They were now, comparatively speaking, safe from pursuit, and Cornu's companion, who doubtless, also, had his reasons for shunning the gendarmes, had papers to prove his identity when, on reaching Antwerp, they applied for passage as emigrants to the Congo. He was accepted, but as Cornu had nothing to show who he was or where he came from, he was refused, the agents of the Free State of Congo being determined to keep the wilds of Africa uncontaminated by the presence of European criminals. It was not in the heart of the "dark continent" that the repentant, or least regretful, murderer could be permitted to begin a new life. Before seperating the two made a division of the few francs that remained in the joint purse, and then Cornu mechanically commenced retracing his steps toward his own country. He re-crossed the frontier, followed the same roads, slept under the same hedges and dodged the same gendarmes; finally, footsore and starving, he reached the capital, went straight to the Palais de Justice and said to a policeman: "Arrest me; I am Cornu, the murderer of the bird dealer of Saint Maur." Now it was misery as much as any thing else that put Cornu in the hands of justice. But one of the ways in which remorse sometimes acts on a guilty man is that it makes him feel himself isolated from the rest of mankind. There are murderers who are haunted by avenging furies quite as terrible as those which women, crowned with writhing serpents and waving lurid torches, represented on the ancient stage, and such men can only find refuge from this mental anguish in a prison cell.—Paris Letter.

THE MAN UNDER THE BED.

His Irresistible Fascination Upon the Mind of Woman.

This fascination, undoubtedly, may be accounted for largely upon traditional and hereditary grounds. Scientists tell us that persistent personal habits tend to reproduce themselves from generation to generation.

Then again, women will continue to look under the bed so long as the world lasts, I suppose, from sheer ingrained curiosity. Who was it that said: "Life would not be worth living for a woman were it not for the constant possibility of finding out some secret?" At all events this is plainly the reason why the women hide their pockets in their dresses: why they organize sewing circles; why they yearn to become postmistresses. Curiosity comes as natural to a woman as singing does to a cat. This looking under the bed every night is one of those innocent little excitements which brighten the dull hue of everyday life and fringe it with romance and poetry. What if the anticipated boots should some time appear! There is excitement enough in that thought to keep even a hard-working society woman in a pleasant flutter all day. Aye, blessings on those superstitious boots! What a dull prosaic life most women would lead if it were not for them.

To look under the bed is a woman's ancient and prescriptive right. Occasionally a witticism is perpetrated which hinges upon some woman's having forgotten to perform this time-honored ceremony. But whoever sets forth, or banks upon, such a witticism, shows his gross ignorance of woman-nature. A woman never forgets to look under the bed. That is a duty and a principle which it is psychologically impossible for her to omit. When a rooster forgets to crow early in the morning, or a plumber forgets to make out a bill in the glad spring-time, we will listen to the amateur humorist who imagines that a woman ever forgets to look under the bed as a prelude to peaceful slumber.—Detroit Free Press.

—To give shirt bosoms, collars and cuffs a glossy appearance, one ounce of white wax and two of spermaceti are melted together and a little of this is put into the starch; or, sometimes a little of a thick solution of gum arabic is used in the starch, a tablespoonful being enough for a pint of starch.

ROOM AT THE TOP.

The Kind of Operative That Will Succeed in Any Circumstances.

A young lawyer once complained to a member of the same profession, who was a very successful practitioner, that the profession was crowded, and that there was but little chance for a young man like himself, whereupon the old and wise man gave the young man a little advice. He said: "Young man, that the lower stratum of the profession is crowded there is no doubt, and it always will be; but, as in all kinds of business, so in ours—there is plenty of room at the top. Get out of the lower ranks and come up higher, and you will not be crowded." While these are not the exact words of the wise doctor, they convey the idea actually expressed, and teach a lesson to laborers and professional men. Did you never notice in an orchard the finest apples and cherries and peaches are always in the very top of the tree, and that they are not crowded, but have plenty of room to grow, and plenty of air and sunshine and dew and rain to assist in their development? Do you not know that the upper rooms of a house are the healthiest to live in, because of the pure air and sunshine. But you will notice they are almost always unoccupied, because, we suppose it is too much like work to climb the stairs. There are some operatives who are never idle. They always have employment and get good wages, and it is just because they have climbed the stairs, and have thoroughly mastered their business; and not only so, they have mastered themselves, and in addition to being proficient in their respective callings, they have trained themselves to be gentlemen, and have given some attention to business principles. They are known to be sober and industrious and well qualified. Such men do not have to seek employment, but employers have an eye on them, and when they wish to change their locations, positions are open to them. Such men become foremen, and eventually the superintendents. In the lower positions, representing the majority of the operatives, will be found those who are all the time complaining that their ranks are crowded. They whine that they get no work to do. The trouble is that they have not the ambition to get up into the place where there is room. Do you ask how I can get to the top? Begin with yourself. If you have nothing else, and be a gentleman. Be sober and honest, and when you find some kind of an opening, go right in and do your best. Slight nothing, and do the best it is in your power to do, and you have made several steps toward the upper room. Too many of the craft are given to frequenting the drinking places, and while we are willing to accord to every man personal liberty and all that kind of thing, we know that employers are not seeking that class of help, nor in just that locality, for foremen or superintendents. Put yourself in the way of employment, and you will not only find it, but it will find you.—Baldwin's Textile Designer.

THE CUCKOO CLOCK.

Revival of the Demand for Curious and Old-Fashioned Time-Pieces.

A book agent: "There seems to me to be quite a revival in the demand for cuckoo clocks. In the days of our grandmothers these were very common, and then for a number of years they became quite scarce. I notice now, however, in my rounds through the country, that nearly every second or third house I go into has a cuckoo clock.

"The cuckoo clocks that I remember to have seen in my childhood, were generally regarded as poor time-pieces, for they had wooden movements which, of course, soon wore out; but those which I notice about the country nowadays are excellent clocks with good metal movements.

"By the way, talking of cuckoo clocks reminds me of a story I used to hear my grandfather tell about them. At the close of the last century an assortment of these clocks was taken out by the missionaries to the Friendly Islands. The native chiefs who received these gifts gazed upon the primitive cuckoo's performance with inexpressible awe. They looked on the mysterious bird as a spy on their actions, and did not care to do any thing within its supposed range of vision which they did not wish the missionaries to know of.

An old islander, being ill, requested the good offices of a missionary and the loan of his cuckoo clock. The sick man believed that the medicine prescribed by the first would be all the more effective for the potential magic which, as he believed, was exercised by the cuckoo.

"One chief, of an inquiring turn of mind, sought to get at the heart of the mystery, and took clock, cuckoo and their respective machinery to pieces in order to discover the secret. Having failed to find it, and being equally unsuccessful in his attempts to put the time-teller into working order again, he applied to the missionaries to help him; but they knew nothing of clock making, and the thing remained worthless, a silent object eliciting the contempt of those who had taken it for an oracle and had trembled in presence of an imaginary power that had no share of potentiality."—Jewelers' Weekly.

The highest specific gravity, upon which in general depends value as fuel, is attained by the bluewood of Texas.

This is an industry that has grown in thirty years from a business that gave employment to a few score of hands. It now employs more than 2,000 fishermen, nearly 2,000 boats and forty vessels, and distributes in various ways more than $600,000 annually. The business of lobster catching in general requires two men to a boat, with 200 traps, at a cost of about $300 for the entire outfit.

SERVANTS IN CHINA.

A Country Where Housekeeping Is Indeed Made Very Smooth.

The ways of the housekeeper are indeed made smooth for her in China, indeed so smooth that, unless she has children to care for, her time often hangs very heavily on her hands. The interior management and care of the house is entirely entrusted to the major domo, or butler, called the "Kwan Su," or the chief of the bottles. But more frequently he is called "boy." Bells not being much used in China, you often hear the cry of "Bhooy!" coming from the neighboring houses. Do not be alarmed. It is probably only the time calling for her sedan chair, or the master who wants a glass of brandy and soda, the standard drink of foreigners all over the East. In taking a house in China the first thing is to get a good boy, the second is to have him "secured." The securing consists in getting some reputable of wealthy China man to agree if the boy runs away with any thing, he will either produce him, or pay the amount of the loss. The servants in the East are all of the male sex, and women are never employed about the house except where there are children, or where a lady has an amah as her personal attendant. The amah's duties lie in keeping her mistress' room in order, dressing her hair, in short, performing the duties of a lady's maid, and, if there are young children, in looking after them. In most cases there is one amah to each child. She receives, according to her qualifications, from five to ten dollars a month as wages, out of which she feeds herself, her wages in fact being higher than those of the other servants. Female servants are in China, as everywhere else, a source of internal discord, as they are constantly carrying tales or making mischief. A lady who can do without an amah thereby gets rid of almost the only vexation in her housekeeping life.—Good Housekeeping.

GIRLS IN FACTORIES.

The Sturdy Maidens Employed in the Wire Mills of Pittsburgh.

There are probably a thousand women in the city of Pittsburgh who work in iron mills making bolts, nuts, hinges and barbed wire. Over three years ago the men who had been working in the bolt works gave such dissatisfaction that the proprietors decided to try girls at the same work. The venture was such a success that nothing would induce them to go back to the boys and men. Just about the same time the wire mill was removed from Illinois to Pittsburgh, and, as the girls were such a success in the bolt works it was decided to give them a trial in the wire mill. Once again they made a success and the doors of the hinge factory were thrown open to them.

For just this purpose the factories were visited to see what kind of people worked there, what prospects they had in life and what they aimed at. At the first sight of the bolt works one can not believe that any thing bright or interesting could live inside. At the call of the 6:30 a. m. whistle girls are seen coming from all directions towards the factory. They are generally dressed tidy and well, and with their lunch baskets on their arms are not unlike any working girl one may see. The first thing they do after entering the building is to change their street dress for one to work in, tie up their hair, roll up their sleeves, and putting on a coffee sack apron are ready to begin the day's labor. At seven o'clock the last whistle blows, the wheels groan and screech as if they were weary to resume another day's work, but in a little while they began to move with more rapidity and the noise amounts to something terrific.

Little girls from six years up to twelve put the nuts on the bolts and pack them. The "nutting on" is also accomplished by machine power. The worker puts a nut on a plate, then, after catching the head of a bolt in the jaws above, she presses her foot on the pedal, when, presto! the work is done. At long tables, built of substantial wood, are rows of young girls, interspersed with a scattering of women whom life cast forth in their old age. They pile the bolts, row after row, alternate heads, then wrap them in strong paper.

The girls always come to the factory clad neatly and well. It seems rather strange, but they never mingle with the men in the same factory. They invariably find sweethearts elsewhere and marry well. The girls were very happy and every thing moved as smoothly as steel on ice, until a forewoman was introduced to take the place of a foreman. Immediately she put a stop to all singing during the day and all dancing at noon. There was a decided stir among the girls at these new rules, but they were forced to submit. Since then they spend the noon hour reading and doing fancy work. Most of the girls are experts with the needle, and those who read would surprise a scholar with their quotations. Still the majority are much addicted to love stories of the "Duchess" order. There are more handsome girls in this factory than could be found among the same number at a reception. They are beautifully formed, and the influence of the oil keeps the hands white and prevents them hardening from contact with the iron.—Nellie Bly, in Philadelphia Press.

SOLVING OLD MYSTERIES.

Opening of a New Era in the Matter of Exploration and Discovery.

The announcement that a commission of savants will shortly set out for Mount Ararat, or the elevation in Western Asia designated by that name, recalls the alleged attempt some years ago to recover from the bed of the Red Sea, at the point where the children of Israel were supposed to have crossed, some relic of the lost hosts of Pharaoh. These statements are but the exaggerated outgrowth of legitimate enterprises having for their object the discovery of archæological treasures, the corroboration of Biblical statements by external evidence. The work of Layard, Lenormant, George Smith and others on the ruins of Nineveh and Babylon testifies how much the world owes to men of this stamp. At their recent meeting the authorities of Yale College appointed a professor to accompany the expedition of the University of Pennsylvania to Babylon, to make further research among its ruins for relics of the mighty city of many gates. The indefatigable labors of Champollion in Egypt, which first gave to the world nearly all we know of the early dynasties of that ancient civilization, are among the most valuable in the history of exploration, while second only in importance are the labors of the missionary priest who wrung history out of the hitherto undecipherable monuments of the Mayas in Mexico. It would seem that a new era is about opening in the matter of exploration and discovery. A Danish expedition will shortly start to explore the interior of Greenland; a Mexican party is preparing to invade the undiscovered interior of Yucatan; the sources of the Amazon are being penetrated, while the Russians are pushing their discovies in Northern Siberia and their possessions within the Arctic Circle. Stanley is in the heart of Africa, and while waiting to hear from him the world listens to the story of the wondrous discoveries in the planetary world by the aid of the superb Lick telescope. Taken all in all, the indications are that before the dawn of the year 1900 many of the mysteries of lost cities and forgotten nations, of nebulæ and stars and interplanetary space will have been revealed to the glorious light of the nineteenth century.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

UNCLE SAM'S ARMY.

Some Light Thrown on a Comparatively Unknown Subject.

If there is any one thing that the average American knows next to nothing about it is the standing army of this great and glorious Republic of ours. The other day a recruiting officer stationed in Baltimore was here, and I had the pleasure of a long conversation with him, and in talking of army matters naturally drifted into the character of the men who enlist, and the causes that have led to so many deserters from the army in the past few years. Speaking of the nationalities of the men who enlist, my friend said:

"I find that, as a rule, the foreign-born recruits are better educated men than the natives. It often happens that a German or Austrian, who applies to me for enlistment, came to this country in the hope of much better employment than the military service affords. He finds when he arrives that the situation has been painted in hues rather more rosy than the circumstances warrant. He is a stranger in a strange land. He is, perhaps, unfamiliar with the language, and knows nothing of the customs of the country, and, after spending all the money he may have brought with him, he finds only the United States army open to him.

"The pay here is better than in Europe and the service very much shorter; and, although he may have left his native country to avoid military service, he seizes upon it here as a means of support. Only this week I enrolled one man who was familiar with several languages and who had served with credit as an officer in the army of Austria."

"Do these men usually re-enlist when their first term expires?"

"No, not often. At the end of the five years they have generally acquired a thorough knowledge of the English language, and saved some little money, and are able to return to their birthplaces or to find some other employment. It is not often that an educated foreigner re-enlists after his first term of enlistment has expired."

"Do the desertions come from this class of foreign recruits?"

"No. On the contrary, they usually are faithful soldiers and retire with an honorable discharge."

"From what class do the desertions come principally?"

"Usually they come from a class of profesional deserters, men who enlist for the purpose of getting out of trouble originally and tire of the military service. When opportunity presents itself they desert, and after remaining out a few months again enlist much to to the detriment of the service."

"Have you any method for marking a deserter now?"

"No, not at the present time. Branding was once resorted to, but this has been abandoned by order of the War Department. It was ineffectual, because the brand would not be discovered unless the soldier attempted to re-enter the service, when an examination would at once disclose the mark."

"What, in your opinion, would prove the most effectual method for preventing desertion?"

"In a report of the Secretary of War for the present year, one of our Generals recommends that every man who enters the United States Service would be tatooed at some place on his arm 'U. S.' In order that there may be no stigma about this it is suggested that the tattooing be extended to the officers as well as to the men. If this was done I think it would have a good effect, although there is a good deal of opposition to the proposal in the army. Some officers assert that they would never submit to the so-called degradation, and they insist that they would retire from the service before permitting the tattooers to do their work. But in my opinion, there are very few officers who who would throw up their commissions for a thing of this kind, especially when it would be so general as to prevent the cry of degradation. It would certainly mark every man who applies for enlistment so well that we could tell in a moment whether he ever served in the army before, and would absolutely prevent the re-enlistment of the men who once desert. If the army could be relieved from the chronic deserters the number of desertions would materially diminish, and there would be fewer reports on this subject to the War Department each year."—Toledo Blade.

How Beauty Fades.

When a woman begins to show her age, the first part to lose its firm, youthful contour is the face and chin, then the neck and bust, and no amount of alum-water washes nor "astringent pomades" will restore firmness to the flabby muscles, and it then becomes necessary to look about for some other beauty that nature spared a little longer, and the upper part of the arms and the back keep their whiteness and delicacy long after the rest of the woman is passed. For that reason was V-shaped back invented, and therefore were sleeveless waists made which leave the arm exposed up above the shoulder. Long gloves hide many a wrinkled hand and withered fore-arm, and the modestly high front of the waist veils the faded bust, while the black velvet ribbon tied tightly around the throat retains the loose flesh in its snug embrace, while it whitens the rest of the neck by contrast, and it also sustains the baggy double chin, together with the 'wrinkle annihilator,' which is made of alum and paraffine and a little sweet almond oil. —Dress.

How to Plant Trees.

It is always better to plant small trees than large ones. They are more easily and cheaply moved, recover sooner and grow more rapidly. A transplanted tree two or three feet high will soon overtake and surpass a much larger one, and will grow into a more vigorous and beautiful specimen. A vast amount of money and a great deal of time is wasted every year in trying to transplant large trees. It is no essential in digging up trees to preserve a large ball of earth about the roots. A very heavy mass of earth often breaks the tender roots, and is, therefore, a danger rather than an advantage to the tree. It is essential, however, to preserve as many of the small feeding roots as possible, and care must be taken in digging a tree not to unnecessarily break or mutilate them. All broken roots should be carefully cut away with a sharp knife before the tree is replanted. Care must be taken not to expose the roots to the drying influence of the sun and wind. They should be covered, as soon as the tree is dug, with a piece of cloth or matting, or they may be dipped in wet mud until they become thoroughly coated. The secret of successful transplanting is to have the soil brought into close and immediate contact with the roots. It is better, therefore, to plant dry and not in wet, rainy weather. The coating of mud not only protects the roots from drying but helps the earth thrown about to adhere more closely. Two men are required to plant a tree. The hole should be twice the width of the mass of roots, and the bottom should be worked fine with a spade. One man should then hold the tree erect, with its roots carefully spread out in all directions in the hole, while the second man should break the soil taken from the hole, so as to make it as fine as possible, and then let it fall from the spade down upon the roots, while the first man should lift the tree gently up and down that the fine earth may penetrate and fill all cavities about the roots. When the hole is nearly filled in this way the earth should be pressed down with the foot, beginning at the outside of the hole and working in toward the stem of the tree. The hole may then be filled and the soil rammed down solid. Tall trees should be carefully and securely staked as soon as planted. The operation is then finished. It is not uncommon to see water being poured into the hole while it is being filled up. This practice does harm rather than good, as it washes the fine soil away from close contact with the roots.

Tramps in Saxony.

Writing from his consulate at Annaberg, Germany, Mr. George B. Goodwin says: Saxony has found a satisfactory way of dealing with tramps. In every town and village there is at least one lodging and eating house for the tramp or other person who seeks food and lodging, and has little or no money to pay for the same. The station and all its appurtenances are the property of the town, and are controlled by the town authorities. A person who applies at the station for food or shelter, or both, and has money with which to pay for the same, secures all that he needs, of common but wholesome quality, for a very moderate but fixed price.

If he be a respectable man, seeking work, that fact will be manifest, and he will be cared for during the days or weeks he may wish to remain. If he has no money, be he a professional tramp or not, he is set to work in the yard cracking stones or splitting wood, for which work he is allowed fifteen pfennings per hour; if, then, he works four hours per day, he earns sixty pfennings, or fifteen cents, and this sum will supply supper, lodging and breakfast.

No bill of fare will be laid before him from which to choose a soup, a roast, a side dish and dessert, and he will find no mosquito netting over his bed and no shams over his pillows; but for his four hours' work he will get a supper consisting of a "chunk" of bread, that tastes better than it looks, a dipper of coffee that will at least warm him up a bit and stimulate the system, and perhaps a piece of oleomargarine; he will get a bunk to sleep in, liberally provided with warm coverings, and as clean a one as can be expected in a lodging-house of this kind. For breakfast he will get about the same as he had for supper, and with perhaps the Saxon imitation of an Irish stew. The station is self-supporting.

As a result of this system, the roads of Saxony are the finest in the world. They are as hard and white as a hound's tooth. Every country road is made with the same care as a city street. One may drive mile after mile in any direction from Annaberg and pass over beautiful roads, hard and smooth, not a loose stone to be seen, not a wheel rut and no debris of any kind. The roads on both sides are flanked by beautiful shade trees. All of the work on the roads is not done by tramps, but much of it is.

What a Blind Man Can Do.

While in the employ of the New Jersey Southern Railroad, a few years ago, Charles H. Fennimore, of Farmingdale, had the misfortune to lose the sight of one eye, the result of getting a hot cinder from the locomotive in it. About a year afterward, while working in a marl pit at Lower Squankum, he got a small sharp pebble in the other eye. He was taken to an infirmary in New York, where every effort was made to save the sight, but he became totally blind.

Revolving in his mind various projects for the support of his family, he determined to try keeping a country store. His friends endeavored to dissuade him from the undertaking, but he was resolute and opened a small store in Lower Squankum, three miles from Farmingdale. He soon showed an aptitude for the business, and accomplished things which seemed marvelous.

His dwelling house is over a mile distant from the store. At first his little daughter regularly took him by the hand at morning and evening and conducted him to and from his occupation. A little later he said he could go alone, and has done so ever since. His method is to count the steps from the front of his house to his store, and he has experienced no difficulty in reaching both in safety. He locks and unlocks the door and opens and closes the shutters without assistance. His son sweeps out and dusts the store, but he expects soon to do this without assistance.

His sense of touch and memory are simply wonderful. Every sort of goods put up in packages is so arranged under his direction that he can deal out anything in his stock that is called for. This he does by counting the steps from either end of the counter, and the number of shelves, beginning with number one at the bottom, and enumerating the dividing spaces from either end of the rows of shelves.

He weighs anything from a quarter of a pound of tea to twenty-five pounds of flour, being guided by touch in arranging the weights and the tipping of the scales.

His memory of voices is so sensitive that he has never been known to make a mistake in a persons name. As a test a stranger to him was sent to the store. He was a fair mimic, and he endeavored to personate a man well known to Mr. Fennimore. He signally failed, the blind storekeeper interrupting him at once, and saying, "I don't know who you are, but you are not George Brower."

Perhaps Mr. Fennimore's greatest evidence of an unfaltering and accurate memory is the facility with which he makes change. Every morning Mrs. Fennimore arranges his wallet for him. The $5 notes are placed in the bottom, the $2 notes in the middle, and the $1 notes on the top of the package. He always knows to a penny how much change he has in an ordinary shot bag, and can tell the instant he touches any piece the value which it represents. Thus equipped he is ready to give a customer change for a note or silver currency, and his accuracy in making change equals that of any merchant in all the country round. Tried one day with a $5 gold piece which was laid in his hand, he looked toward the owner of it as if he could see him, smiled, rang the coin upon the counter, and said: "This is a $5 gold piece; what did you wish to buy?"

He is expert at addition and subtraction, readily keeping in his mind a dozen articles and their price, and telling a customer the amount the moment the last article is served. He is pleased with his occupation, and has made his business a modest success.

Can't Get too Much.

There was a bridal couple coming in on the Bay City train the other day, and the passengers in that particular car were on the grin most of the time over their antics. The bride had got the man she loved, and she didn't care a copper who saw her pillow her head on his shoulder. The bridegroom had got a farm with his wife, and if he wanted to feed her gumdrops or squeeze her hand whose business was it? A littld old man, dried up and baldheaded, sat directly in front of the couple, and he looked around so often that the young husband finally explained:

"We're just married."

"I knowed it all the time," chuckled baldhead.

"And we can't help it, you know."

"No, you can't—be darned if you kin."

"I presume it all seems very silly to an old man like you," continued the husband.

"Does it! does it!" cackled the old fellow, as he bobbed around. "Well, you bet your life she doesn't. I've been right thar three times over, and am now on my way to Canada to marry a fourth! You orter see me a week hence. I'll hug and squeeze and fondle at the rate of 40 miles an hour, and darn the skunk that laffs at me. Silly! Why, children, it's parrydise biled right down!"—Detroit Free Press.

Order of Publication.

Maria Grove by her husband and next friend, William P. Grove, vs. Amanda Moore and John J. Moore, her husband.

No. 433 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree for a sale of certain mortgaged premises in Garrett county, which were mortgaged by the defendant, Amanda Moore, to William P. Grove, of whom the complainant is the assignee.

The bill states that on the 31st day of March, 1883, William P. Grove sold to Amanda Moore, wife of John J. Moore, a tract of land situate, lying and being in Garrett county, Maryland, at and for the sum of four thousand dollars, and on the same day executed and delivered a deed of conveyance for said land to the said Amanda Moore.

The bill further states that the said Amanda Moore on the 31st day of March, 1883, executed and delivered to the said William P. Grove, a mortgage on said land to secure the payment, on or before the 1st day of April, 1884, the sum of three hundred dollars, and also to secure ten annual payments according to the tentor of ten single bills in said mortgage mentioned, the same being for the balance of the purchase money for said land.

The bill further states that the said Amanda Moore, jointly with her husband, the said John J. Moore, executed and delivered to the said William P. Grove their ten joint and several single bills; two of said single bills have been paid, and the other eight remain unpaid; that on the 18th day of February, 1885, the said William P. Grove, for value received, assigned said mortgage, together with said notes to the said Maria Grove; that there appears a credit on one of said notes of two hundred and fifteen dollars, and there now remains of said purchase money, together with the interest thereon accrued unpaid and owing the sum of $2,908.83.

The bill further states that default has been made in the payment of said purchase money; that the said land was purchased by said Amanda Moore out of her separate estate and that the money paid on account of said purchase money was paid by the said Amanda Moore out of her separate estate.

The bill further states that the said Amanda Moore has been living separate and apart from her said husband, the said John J. Moore, and charges that the said John J. Moore never had an interest to any extent whatever in said property, and that he doth not reside in the State of Maryland.

The bill prays that said real estate may be sold for the payment of said mortgage debt and interest accrued, for such other and general relief as the nature of the case may require, and for process against the defendants.

It is thereupon ordered, by the Circuit Court for Garrett county in Equity, this 4th day of June, 1888, that the complainant cause a copy of this order, together with the object and substance of the bill, to be inserted in some newspaper published in Garrett county once a week for four successive weeks, before the 9th day of July, 1888, giving notice to the said John J. Moore, and warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor, on or before the 5th day of September next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree shall not pass as prayed.

CONSTIPATION

IS called the "Father of Diseases," because there is no medium through which disease so often attacks the system as by the absorption of poisonous gases in the retention of decayed and effete matter in the stomach and bowels. It is caused by a Torpid Liver, not enough bile being excreted from the blood to produce Nature's own cathartic, and is generally accompanied with such results as

Loss of Appetite,
Sick Headache,
Bad Breath, etc.

The treatment of Constipation does not consist merely in unloading the bowels. The medicine must not only act as a purgative, but be a tonic as well, and not produce after its use greater costiveness. To secure a regular habit of body without changing the diet or disorganizing the system

"My attention, after suffering with Constipation for two or three years, was called to Simmons Liver Regulator, and, having tried almost everything else, concluded to try it. I first took a wineglassful and afterwards reduced the dose to a teaspoonful, as per directions, after each meal. I found that it had done me so much good that I continued it until I took two bottles. Since then I have not experienced any difficulty. I keep it in my house and would not be without it, but have no use for it, it having cured me."—GEO. W. SIMS, Ass't Clerk Superior Court, Bibb Co., Ga.

Soldier Against Soldier.

In the side of the high bluff on the northern bank of the Chattahoochee River, near De Foor's Ferry, could be seen a freshly cut trench stretching as far as the eye could reach.

It was the 4th of July, 1864, and Sherman's army had pushed Hood's forces from the hard fought battle at Resaca down to New Hope church and Kennesaw and from there on to the banks of the Chattahoochee River. A picket line from the 42nd Georgia had been detailed to prevent as long as possible the Federal forces from crossing the river.

The trees on the Federal side proved quite an ally to them. Under cover of the darkness they would creep to the thickest portion and there await the coming of daylight. From this elevated position they could look down into the trench of the Confederates and pick off the men one by one, until they were discovered and shot down or forced to descend from the number of bullets whizzing around them.

The morning dawned bright and beautiful, and soon the air above the bottom lands was quivering in the torrid heat steaming from the god of day as he looked down upon the soldiers from a cloudless sky. The heat was so oppressive that neither side appeared to be doing much fighting, but contented themselves with making the best of a bad business in endeavoring to keep comfortable.

About 10 o'clock a Confederate soldier named House poked his head from between the branches to see what the other side was doing.

He looked but a moment, and that moment was his last, for the shot he presented was too good a one to be overlooked by the Yankees. A well directed bullet from one of the soldiers perched in a tree top, penetrated the skull of the venturesome man, and he fell back dead among his comrades.

A storm of bullets from the Confederates poured into the tree from which the shot had been fired, and the blue-coated soldier was forced to make a hasty descent.

As he touched the ground and tumbled behind the breastworks he cried out in a taunting voice:

"Why don't you fellows fight fair? You are afraid to do it, and would rather act like cowards and burrow in the dirt. I dare any one of you to stand out and fight a fair and square fight to the death!"

"We are not afraid, but it's you are afraid and can't fight without hiding in tree tops," replied a young Tennessean from the trench in the lowlands.

"I dare you to fight me fair and square," replied the Yankee.

"I'll do it," came back the answer from the Tennessean, "if your side will declare a truce."

"All right, come on, then," called the Yankee, stepping upon the breastworks, gun in hand.

The dialogue, which could plainly be heard from both sides for a considerable distance, was listened to in eagerness by all the soldiers. They were all attention at the prospect of something out of the ordinary course of events, and seeing that both soldiers meant business, the men began crawling out of the trenches until they were lined with blue coats on one side and with gray jackets on the other.

"Well, Johnny, we'll fire an artillery signal and then we'll both shoot until one or the other bites the dust," called out the Federal; "will that suit you?"

"Yes, I reckon that's fair enough, Yank; give the word when you are ready," replied the Confederate, cocking his piece.

"I'm heeled; are you ready?"

"Yes, I'm ready."

The heavy boom of a cannon sounded out upon the summer air and went rolling and rumbling down the river.

The crack, crack, of the two guns sounded almost simultaneously upon the ears of the excited witnesses to this strange duel.

Both soldiers were unharmed and began loading for dear life, for their lives depended upon who should make the next shot.

Bang, bang, went the guns again, but still the soldiers were both standing unhurt, and began to frantically recharge their pieces.

With bated breath the bystanders looked on as shot after shot was being fired until each man had sent five bullets whistling toward his opponent. The strain on the nerves of every man was terrible, worse than when in an actual engagement with the enemy. With dilated eyes and half opened mouths they bent forward in their eagerness to see who would fire the next shot.

The Yankee's piece was loaded first, and as the Tennesseean was raising his gun he fired.

The gray jacket started forward, threw out his arms, from which fell his gun, and, staggering forward, fell dead. A sigh burst from the heart of every Confederate, a sigh of regret rather than pity, that they had been beated by the Yankees. A shout of triumph burst from the Federals, a long continued shout, which awoke the echoes of the river, and was taken up all along the line until it sounded for miles down the stream.

Caps were thrown in the air, and for a time a scene of enthusiasm rarely witnessed prevailed among the Federals. The shouts maddened the Confederates and were answered by a rebel yell. Fifty of their number defied the Yankees, and defied fifty of them to fight a duel with them, one at a time. The challenge was accepted, and for a time it appeared that a dueling battle was about to be fought.

The unusual commotion attracted the attention of the Confederate officers, and upon learning the cause of the excitement they ordered the men back to their places and declared the truce at an end.

"Get to your hole, Johnny!" "Get to your hole, Yank!" were the shouts sent forth by the opposing forces, followed by a general scramble, and soon not a head was seen above the trenches.

The unusual duel was the theme of conversation for many nights around the soldier's camp fires, but the Confederates asserted that the Yankee used a Wentworth gun, while the Tennesseean had an inferior gun, an Enfield rifle. Even now the old veterans often get together and discuss the singlehanded engagement between the Yankee and the Tennesseean. The story was given me by an eye witness who did not know the name of eiter the young Confederate or his Union enemy.

He Didn't Stay Long.

In this connection, says the gossiper of the Omaha Herald, in referring to Col. Peter A. Sarpy, a prominent figure in the early history of Nebraska, it will not be out of place to relate an incident characteristic of Col. Sarpy. During a general conversation in the main room of the Bellevue trading post one evening in 1885, he portrayed in glowing colors the noble traits of the Indians, and denounced the injustice and wrong which they had suffered at the hands of the whites, who had by means of one-sided treaties deprived them of their lands. He was rather rudely interrupted by a stranger, who said:

"This talk about the Indians as good, brave and intelligent may suit you traders, who have been enriched by exchanging your worthless gewgaws for their valuable buffalo robes, but I have lived among them too, and know them to be a lying, thieving, treacherous race, incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, and the sooner they are exterminated the better it will be for the country."

Col. Sarpy walked up to the stranger and said to him in a very excited manner: "Do you know who I am, sir? If you want to fight, sir, I can whip the devil, sir! If you want satisfaction, sir, choose your weapons, Bowie knife, shot-gun, or revolver, sir, I am your man!"

Thereupon he whipped out his revolver and fired at a candle on a table about ten feet distant. The bullet extinguished the light, leaving the room in darkness, under cover of which the thoroughly frightened stranger made his escape.

A little colored boy in South Carolina made an attempt to write an excuse to his teacher for his absence as follows: "Dear Affectionately teacher: Ise sorry I couldn't come to school on Friday, but I couldn't cause it rain and dat's de way it go in dis world. If he Lord shut de door, no man can open de door. If de Lord say open de door, no man can shut de door. If de Lord say 'it rain,' no man can stop it rain. But de Lord, he do all things well, and you oughtn't to growl about it."

A Congressman, on receiving his hat from the cloak-room, asked the waiter how he knew it was his hat, and was promptly answered: "I don't know it was your hat; I only knows it wuz the hat you gub to me."

The Issue of 1888.

The tariff plank of the Democratic national convention was the result of a thirty-six hours' struggle in the committee. The point at issue in that prolonged contest was the wording of the tariff plank. Understand clearly that it was not the position which the party should take, but the phraseology in which that position should be stated. There were two factions in the committee, one headed by Senator Gorman, of Maryland, the other by Henry Watterson, of Kentucky. Both were animated by a desire for the success of the Democracy this fall, and only differed in opinion as to what language could catch the greater number of voters.

Watterson, at the head of the free-trade contingent, believed that a square committal of the party to tariff reduction was the thing that would be most fruitful of votes. Gorman, at the head of the other faction, believed that the plank should be one that could be interpreted as protectionist in manufacturing states, and as free-trade elsewhere, as it would succeed better. The outcome of the fight was that Gorman was allowed an indorsement of the "straddle" of the platform of 1884, while Watterson was allowed the sentence which declares the President's free-trade message to be the correct Democratic interpretation of that plank.

The result of that compromise was the following utterance on the tariff:

The Democratic party of the United States, in national convention assembled, renews the pledge of its fidelity to Democratic faith and reaffirms the platform adopted by its representatives in the convention of 1884; and endorses the views expressed by President Cleveland in his last earnest message to Congress as the correct interpretation of that platform upon the question of tariff; and also endorses the efforts of our Democratic Representatives in Congress to secure a reduction of excessive taxation

This is distinctly free-trade. How the protectionist Democrats can stand upon that narrow endorsement of the 1884 platform passes our comprehension, when the President's message is declared to be its official Democratic interpretation, and considering that the convention immediately thereafter adopted the following resolution without dissent:

Resolved, That this convention hereby endorses and recommends the early passage of the bill for reduction of the revenue now pending in the House of representatives.

For, be it remembered, that the bill here mentioned—the Mills bill—provides for:

Free trade in lumber, which we produce to the value of nearly three hundred millions of dollars annually.

Free trade in wool, of which we produce over three hundred millions of pounds annually.

Free trade in tin plates and cotton ties, which we already import to the value of seventeen millions of dollars annually.

Free trade in hemp, flax, manilla, jute, and other fibres, and importations of which already supplant American products to the value of thirty-five millions of dollars annually;

Free trade in cement, potash, lime and brick;

Free trade in meats, game and poultry;

Free trade in vegetables, peas, and beans;

Free trade in marble and stone;

Free trade in at least one hundred other articles produced in this country, most of which would be produced in sufficient quantities for home consumption if properly protected.

It is clear that, despite the attempted shuffle, the free traders triumphed, and that, for the first time in its history, the Democratic party stands clearly committed to a policy of revenue reduction that strikes at American industries and at the employment and wages of American workingmen. That is the issue of the campaign. The Republican party stands pledged to reduce the revenue, but by methods which shall protect these interests. The voters of the nation have their choice between business stagnation, low wages and bankruptcy on the one hand, and good wages, good business and prosperity on the other.—Toledo Blade.

PALLAS-ATHENE.

Done Over for Fourth of July.

[Written for This Paper.]

JOHN BULL long ago
Had a pain in his head,
Such a terrible pain
That it sent him to bed,
And there he lay groaning from morning till night;
While hither and thither, in nervous affright,
Ran nurses and quacks with their plasters and potions,
With strife incoherent and conflict of notions.

As always, when doctors abound very thick,
The patient grew momently more and more sick,
Till finally they were constrained to agree
One thing might relieve him—a strong cup of tea.
With wild incantations and desperate haste
They made it and sweetened it up to his taste,
Then rushed to his bedside, plumb full of advice,
And poured the hot flood down his throat in a trice;
When lo! from a crack in his cranium's top
Our Goddess of Liberty sprang with a hop,
All clad in the garments of wisdom and might,
With a loud martial shout and a screech of delight.

Poor Johnny fell over, as scared as a goose,
Quacking something or other about the "abuse,"
While a mad exclamation that rhymes with the same
Fell off from his lips in a way scarcely tame;
But the gods high in council, they greeted the maid,
Declaring she shouldn't be cast in the shade
By her brow-beating governor, not if they knew it,
He'd better lie low, or he'd certainly rue it.

The old gent recovered, made up with his daughter,
And gave her a free passage over the water.
The years came and went, and his confidence grew;
He'd let her sling, sometimes, her thunderbolts, too;
Supply her with weapons of goodly advice.
And though they cost nothing, they always were nice.

Now when she does something remarkably fine
He smiles in a way that is sweet and benign,
And, chucking her under her chin, exclaims:
"Ah,
My beauty, how much you resemble your pa!"
And when he is very good-natured, you know,
He will joke—just a mite—of the time long ago,
When he thought in his soul he should certainly die
Of that pain in his head on the Fourth of July.

YOU can't fool a kid, fellows, and they hain't no use o' talkin'. The fust time I sees him an' her together I sets it all down in my mind that they was jest the niftiest couple as ever walked inter the mission. Ye 'member them days I were a reg'lar perfeshnal bootblack—a "shine 'em up," ye savey, and no more dreamed o' bein' "tiger" to a fine lady than you kids dream o' bein' Governer. Bet I yurned my place, my honies, and don't you forget it!

As I was sayin', when I see them two beeyootiful creachers a-walkin' side by side inter the mission—one a teacher o' boys an' one a teacher o' gals—I jest sets in my mind that God made them two fur each other, sure—and I haint got no reason to change my 'pinion as yet.

"I allus loved him—he was so grand, and tall, and strong-lookin', and fur all his grandness and tallness and strong-lookinness, thar was that gentle, sweet, kind way he had as 'ud make a kid wanter lay his poor, little, lonesome head agin the beeyootiful black shoulder, and jest stay there all night. I done that very thing wunst—honest Injen, kids, I axshally done it—and I haint surprised at yer 'stonished looks; 'cause I were so lifted clean outen myself by the heaven I dreamed of comin' true that I clean forgot who I were and where I were, and that my name was only Tim Lee. I didn't think o' nothin' but mother, and Heaven, and angels, and all them kind o' thoughts—for he held me close and soft and easy, jest like mother sister, and I forgot the awful pain in my broken leg, and was 'most glad I broke it if I could keep on layin' there so close in his arms and touch his fine clo'se with my cheek, and breath the sweet stuff on his hunky chiff!

And she kem over, too, and looked awful solemn and pityful at me, and ax me how I kem to slip right offen the Mission steps, and how thick were the ice there and why weren't it shoveled off!

I couldn't answer her, 'cause I didn't know nothin' about it; but I watched the perty eyes a meetin' his, and his eyes a turnin' away with a queerish look in 'em that haint never lost on a kid like me. I knowed from that moment he loved her; but he were so simple, somehow, like a innercent child that he never made her read the riddle in his eyes—gee, but they was daisies, kids! Great big brown eyes that jest melted alter pieces with nothin' but the warmth that kem a wellin' up from his gener's heart!

How soft he spoke ter me—how gentle he touched my poor broken leg; and when I writhed his chin, that looked like one that I wunst saw outer a marble stature in a dime museyum, shivered and shook like a hurt thing.

Oh, he were a darlin'! And when I were all well again and outen the hospital, I uster watch fur him on his own particklier home-comin' street and make him let me give him a shine fur a present—and he'd smile and pat my red head and jest let me do whatever I wanted ter with his elegant boots.

Han'some? Not any—leastways he weren't han'some in the same curly way her really truly beau were. His mustaches didn't have no filligree trimmin's at the ends ner his hair go a wavin' from the middle of his head in slick scallops; ner he didn't wear no shinin' pale-blue neck-tie, ner sport yaller leather gloves with black stitchin' all down the outside—oh, no; yer kin betcher sweet life he didn't! He'd never be obleeged ter have ter dipend sech make ups as them fur his fine looks—not by a good deal! He were jest plain and honest good lookin'; and his heart were as perty as his big brown eyes—fur he showed it every day of his life, while the other fellar hid his'n—sech as it were—under his striped silk wescut.

Every Sunday at the Mission I see 'em, all through the cold spring and the late comin' summer; and the more I sees 'em the more I watches their goin's on; and I see the haint come to even guess he loves her like blazes and is jest too innercent and back'ard to up and tell her so; but, jeeminy, if the other fellar haint got the glitterin' brass on his cheeks! He jest shinnies 'round and is all grins and perlite bows and makes a pertendance at teachin' us fellars at the Mission, and we kids know as much as he do and gives him sech points on religious questions as staggers the moke. But he keeps on a readin' Scripter ter us, though we kin see he could kill every last one of us cheerful enough; and all 'cause she bleeves in sech goin's on, and he has a eye on the rich young woman as kin afford to ride them kind o' hobbies.

And when the Fourth of July is perty nearly here, the rich young woman says as how she's goin' ter give us kids a picnic in the Wintry woods. Ole Job Wintry's her uncle and she's his sole airss, and she kin do jest what she wants ter with both of 'em. And she tells the lady and gentlemen teachers of the Mission that she shall expect 'em to help her "entertain the lambs of her little flock;" and I see the curly wolf a bowin' and a scrapin' and I makes up my mind to stay close by the fold and not git alone with him in the Wintry woods!

The fellar that runs the weather racket were kind and perlite as chips that Fourth of July. Such sunlight and big pink clouds and shinin' waters and soft warm winds! I kep' close ter my teacher, and his lovin', kind eyes kep' lookin' so glad down inter my face, that, somehow, I felt he was goin' ter do some pleasant thing fur me; and then and there I made up my mind if the chance came I'd do somethin' fur him.

The whole caboodle of us were driv out in 'busses—sech a jolly percession of 'em! But she and the curly fellar went flyin' 'long past us in a stylish buggy hitched outer two spankin' showy gray nags—her own turnout, yer mind, kids. Then a little cloud kem up, somehow, at sight of 'em, and I see it settle over my dear teacher's watchin', wistful eyes; and I filed a vow on top o' tother one that I'd just go right to her and tell her my 'pinion o' them two lovers o' hern. Seemed like she didn't have nobody to tell her nothin', or she'd a never wasted no time on that hifalutin' dandy. O' course her ole aunt were allus a trapesin' along with her—a whiein' and goin' on ridiculous; but she were worse than jest nobody at all; 'sides, I knowed she druther have the curly man, any day, fur his looks.

The wintry woods was cool and green and chuck full o' dancin' lights and shadders, and the air in it were sweeter than the lovely stuff on my teacher's Sunday hankychiff. I breathed so deep, kids, that I 'most got tipsy on the smell o' the spicy woods—I wanted ter yell, and howl, and roll over and over in all the loveliness. And I does roll over; and 'cause the air was so cool, and the shadders so deep, and the grass so soft I falls sound asleep. And when I gets ter dreamin' I thinks I hears her a talkin' soft and quiet like—and a arguin' this away and that; and, will you b'leeve me, fellers, when I opened my eyes, lo, if they weren't somebody talkin' right on the opposite side o' the big tree I were a layin' under—and it were her voice!

"It is true," I heered her a sayin', "it is true that I have known you for quite a while, Mr. Montressor, and that I have every reason to think you are an upright and honorable gentleman, but the question you have asked me is one that I can not answer, I fear, without giving you pain—"

"Ah, do not say that Miss Wintry!"—kids, it were the curly man a holdin' forth. "Think how dark my life will become without your sweet presence! All will be a blank to me, and my heart will be crushed and broken! Oh, Miss Wintry, I have longed for this hour—I have lived in the sweet consciousness that my suit was not displeasing to you—that my love would surely win love in return, and that—"

Fellars, I couldn't help it. I got so scairt, fearin' she would up and lissen approovin' ter that perty speech o' his'n, that I jest gave one awful yell like a Injun in a fit!

My yell had two twin echoes—Mister Montressor and Miss Wintry jest screeched like all possessed, and the curly dude 'fore he got the right lay o' land axshuly struck out and run! I crawled round through the green ferns and grass to where she were a sittin', and axed her pardon fur scarin' her, humble enough; but she jest laughed hearty, and put her dazzlin' white hand on my red top-knot, and says:

"I thank you, Jim; you have done me a great service!" and laughed again.

"Miss Wintry," says I, a kneelin' close beside her dress of perty white stuff that was a layin' like foamin' billows all round her, "Miss Wintry, don't lissen to that man no more; he hain't wuth one sweet glance o' yer perty eyes. Turn yer 'tention to one who loves yer as the flowers loves the dew—one who is as innercent and back'ard as the vi'lets theirselves, and who wouldn't dare ter speak out his love like that speechifyin' dandy, 'cause its too great and holy and—"

"Boy," and I heerd a little tremble in her soft voice, "of what are you speaking? By whose authority—"

"Don't know what that means, 'um, but I'm speakin' of my teacher, Mister John Gray."

"And can not he speak for himself?" she says, unconscious like.

"It seems as if he can not, 'um; and——"

"There—that will do. You are a good boy and I like you, Jim, and I wish—I wish—that what you imagine were really true!" And, Kids, she looked away off through the wintry woods with a soft mist in her beeyootiful eyes, while her perty hand smoothed my brow like the touch of a lovin' little white cloud. I think she furgot us both fur a minute or two, fur she kep' a pattin' me and a talkin' soft to herself: "As flowers love the dew—backward as a violet—and why! Because—no, that will not serve for an excuse—this is the nineteenth century and the man is—a coward!"

"Who's a coward, Miss Wintry!" says I, a jumpin' onter my feet.

"Your teacher, John Gray!"

"That's not true!" I says, stung at her words, yet not exactly understandin' 'em. "He's the bravest man that ever breathed, and you will have to say so before the day is ended—you, Miss Wintry, who haint half good enough fur him—no, ner no woman that lives!"

Kids, I left her there with her face hid in her hands—not cryin' but lookin' like a hurt child. I were awful sorry; but she made me too mad fur me to want ter stay a minute more nigh her. John Gray had got to be avenged! What could he be made ter do that 'ud show her he were brave and darin'! I went off by myself and thought it all out; then went and found my dear teacher.

"Mister Gray," says I, whisperin', "you done me lots o' good turns, and if you'll jest foller my lead mebbe I kin do you a couple er so."

"All right, Jim," says he, laughin', "I never take a dare—what's to be done?"

"Oh, nothin' jest now. Only keep close ter Miss Wintry all day long fur one thing, save and 'ceptin' the times I need yer help. Promise me ye won't git riled at what I does, no matter how reckless it 'pears ter you."

"Pleasant conditions to begin with, Jim; it's a bargain—I promise. My boy, there's a fierce light in your blue eyes—what sort of storm does it betoken?"

"Like nuff you kin tell me when the thunder and lightnin's over, sir?" And then I leaves him a-laughin', and perceeds—on the strict quiet, ye mind, fellers—to climb a tall tree near to where they was beginnin' to spread out a galorious lunch. I takes a stout piece o' rope up with me (it kem from 'round the crockery box) and makes it fast to a long bent limb. Then I slips the other end 'round my own body, safe and fast, catches my jacket up over a twig I broke off on perpose, and perceeds to hang there in the air—leastwise that's what I 'pear to be doin' ter the folks below. With one direful shriek I call fur [illegible] pertend ter see nothin' nor nobody but ter Montrissor, and I howl for him ter come up and help me 'fore I perish. He looks up with his mouth so full o' cheese and crackers that I 'most spoil my pertin' and laugh out loud. But he didn't move anywheres near the tree, you bet, an Miss Wintry screams: "Oh, save the child!" At these words off goes one man coat, and John Gray is shinnin' up the tree like mad, and in a twinklin' I am picked up onter the limb.

"You little monkey!" says he, a breathin' and a pantin'.

"You kin bet I wished I were," says I, a whisperin' back; "for monkes have got a soft snap of it—a wrappin' their tails round limbs o' trees—I had er use this," and I showed him the rope that kep' me from fallin'.

"By all that's marvelous—"

"Don't ye git excited, sir; it's the fust trick—and you jest foller my lead all day and we'll come out ahead—that's all!"

We slid down the big tree and was met by all the picnickers with cries of joy. I kep' my face straight, and when she kem up and clasped his hand I saw the blood go a flyin' to his honest face, and he turned away, shy and silent.

It were a rip-snortin' good dinner, fellars, and no mistake. We, bein' the lions, eat the lion's share—leastways I did. But I managed to git through it 'fore any o' the others. You kin bet I didn't slight nothin' from sanditches ter pie; but I got through fust, as I were a tellin' ye, and went sneakin' off towards where them two grays was a munchin' their nooday oats. They was tied to a couple o' saplins', and it weren't long 'fore I were on the back o' the friskiest looking one of 'em and a goin it slambang through the woods. I had a good safe grip on the short rein, I kin tell you, fellars; and I knowed what I were about. The harness were all on, trim and trig, and nothin' less'n partin' with his own hide would a throwed me! I haint rid the trick mule at the circusses, I haint, fur nothin'. Yet I 'magine I must a looked perty scarified as I kem a yelpin' past the pic-nickers at a fearful gait—lookin' all the world like the wax Mazepper I seen at that same museum last summer—only I were 'lire and kickin'! Kickin'! Well, I should reckon—and a thrashin' out with my best leg like mad and succeedin' 'mazin' well in my object—which were ter frighten the nar clean outen his senses! Clean outen the woods we rushed like the wind, and when I'd got out o' sight behind a little hill I pulled him cleak square round ter stabbord and went gollopin' back agin. They was all lookin' anxious toards where I disappeared, and John Gray were ready fur me (as I knowed he would be), a comin' ter meet me on tother gray nag. I yelled "help!" so you could a heared me a plumb mile, and on kem John Gray toards my poor scairt beast.

O' course he cotch us easy as wink—but it looked like a wild West show—fur he rode like Wild Bill and I yelled like a Comanche! When we was a quietin' down and trottin' passive up ter the place where their dinner was a-waitin' for them poor 'bused hosses, I says:

"Trick number two—oh, we're a-doin' beeyootiful!"

"You little rascal—what are you up to?"

"I'm up to my knees in catnip, if yer please," says I, as I slid down from my foamin' steed and sniffed at the sweet smell o' crushed leaves.

Some performance of congratulatin' us both. Some claspin' of John Gray's hand by her perty white one. Some blushin' and turnin' away of eyes—but more light in hern—and a softness and sweetness that were encouragin' to behold.

All us kids run like wild through the Wintry woods. They was a perty little stream called Silver creek, 'cause it were so clear and ripply. Jest a stone's throw from the place dinner were eaten the creek got wider 'n' made a dandy place to row a skiff in. Right on the banks of this stream we all shot off fire-crackers fur hours, pack after pack, kids; hiyi, but weren't it fun on the half-shell! I 'most furgot my avengin' business in the high ole times I were hevin', and 'tweren't till I [illegible] of the little spit-fires into a tin can that I see my way clear ter make a p'int. I fills a sardine box nearly full of fire-crackers, pressed down the bent lid and slips it slyly inter the gaping pocket of the curly Montressor, who sits close by Miss Wintry a holdin' her bambersol over her head and a hanging onter every syllabub she says, waitin' his chances, like snuff, ter go over the same perlaverin' I nipped in the green, green bud earlier in the day. It were the neatest fit, kids, yer ever seen, and thanks ter that same parashoot he were holdin', he never see me gettin' in my work. I skinned up a convenient tree and watched fur the fust act in the new skit. Dreckly the fun begun—the fuse cotch on and sech a scairt man ye never heern tell on! Give you my word he danced round like a feller in a bumble-bee's nest a yellin' fit ter kill! Hurt him? How could it? The crackers was all inside the tin box and though it did sound perty lively it couldn't hurt him. Well, he performed like a rooster with his head off a tryin' to git some one to help him and nobody a knowin' what on earth were the matter. Bimebye John Gray cotch on and marched up ter the screamin' Montressor and begun ter take his tony summer coat offen him, laughin' so hard that the tears went rollin' down his face. Miss Wintry, when she found there weren't no danger laughed, too—though she tried ter be perlite and sympathizin'. But her laughin' were too much fur the curley swell, and he got so outrageous mad he dove into the heart o' the woods and cut across country to the nearest station and went home 'thout so much as by yer leave!

"LIKE A FELLOW IN A BUMBLE-BEE'S NEST.

There were a little skift on the brink called the "Undine," or some sech heathenish sort of a name, and I rowed myself out inter the stream. 'Twere 'most time ter be a-goin' home, fur the sun had gone clean down behind some shoomack bushes on the top of the high hill near by, and the frogs and the katydids began to croak louder fur the night. There were only one thing more ter be done in the avengin' line, and I done it. I began ter rock the tipsy little craft as I stood up on the seat in the very middle of the boat, and when I got her into full swing, jest gave one unearthly yell and upset her before their eyes. Down I went like a regular shot and there I stayed till I knowed they must be gettin' clean crazy about me. I hadn't paddled 'round our docks at home fur nothin'—no more 'n I'd ride the trick mule every chance I'd git, and I jest kep' under water till I could'nt stand it no longer, then bobbed up serecnly kerslap agin John Gray's arm. I knowed he'd be there and I jest played faint and laid as limp and still as I could over his strong right arm.

"Are you crazy, boy—what have you done this for?" I heerd close into my ear.

"Fur effeck," I whispered without openin' my eyes." I kin swim like a whale, boss, but you jest hold onter me and lug me ashore. When you git me thar roll me fur more effeck, and I'll come to."

He were very obejint. And when I, slow and solemn-like, opened my eyes, there stood Miss Wintry a cryin' over us both. I see she cried most over John Gray, who never were in no danger, and took ter wringin' him out—now this drippin' sleeve, now that, and a declarin', between breaths, that he were the bravest man she ever saw!

Avenged!

Well, fellars, the other gentleman there hitched the hosses up in a hurry, bundled us wet folks inter the stylish wehickle, and she told John Gray to drive as fast as he could ter ole Job Wintry's and wait there fur her. My teacher were rigged up in a ole suit o' Job Wintry's and I were fixed up in togs jest like this very same harness, kids—braid down the pants, brass buttons and all.

Then I heerd how the 'busses kem and took the other kids home. The ole uncle sent his big keeridge over fur Miss Wintry and her aunt, his sister. And then we stayed all night—and there I'm stayin' yit.

So's John Gray.

Yer never see any thing work so slick as them schemes o' mine! When Miss Wintry kem softly inter the great hall where a fire had been made ter warm and dry us, she went straight over to where John Gray sat and stood before him. He jumps up when he sees her there, but she makes him jist sit right down again, and fetches a little stool from the corner herself and sits down 'most like it was at his feet.

"Do you know," says she, in sech a tremblin' voice, "that a little fairy—a brownie—came to me in the woods to-day? Ah, I thought not! And he told me so many things—told me of a great soul, so brave, and tender and true—yet so modest, withal, that he dared not give utterance to the one wish of his heart! Who loves a kindred being, the brownie said, as flowers love the dew; who is backward as a violet, and for whom Miss Wintry is not half good enough—no, nor any other woman that lives!"

"Miss Wintry!"

"That is what the brownie said, sir! And when I called the man a coward for his silence, this fairy rebuked me and said I should take it all back—as I do, John Gray, as I do now, with a thousand apologies for the wrong I have done you in my heart!"

"Hooray," I yells, "it's all comin' out jest like a dime novel—herowine and all! Haint ye goin' ter answer her, Mister Gray?"

"With all my heart, Tim, when you have given me a chance. But—but—I fear I do not understand—"

"How hard you make it for me—John?"

Well, there weren't much trouble after that, I kin tell yer. And I been "tiger" for Missus Gray ever since that day two years ago, with money o' my own in bank and a yearly liberal 'lowance o' crackers 'n' torpedoes to celebrate the anniversary of that Fourth o' July, when my master, John Gray, followed my lead!

EVA BEST.

We All Have Our Influence.

Some persons fall discouraged on the highway of life, because they can not be this or that great or eminent person. Why not be willing to be themselves? No person who ever has lived, or ever will live, is without influence. Why not make the most of that? Since you can not grasp that which you wish, why let what you have slip through your fingers? No person in the world is exactly like you. You have your own faults, but you have also your own excellencies individual to yourself. Give them air. Because you are not a poet, should you not be a good merchant? Because you can not go to college, should you therefore forswear the alphabet? Because you can not build a palace, should you not rejoice in your own humble roof, and that because it is your own? Will not the sun also shine into your windows if you do not obstinately persist in shutting it out? If you can not have a whole hot-house full of flowers, may you not have one sweet rose?—N. Y. Ledger.

Stay in the Sun-Light.

Sleepless people, and there are many in America, should court the sun. The very worst soporific is laudanum, and the very best sunshine. Therefore it is very plain that poor sleepers should pass as many hours as possible in the sunshine and as few as possible in the shade. Many women are martyrs, and yet they do not know it. They shut the sunshine out of their houses and their hearts, they wear vails, they carry parasols, they do all possible to keep off the subtlest and yet most potent influence which is intended to give them strength and beauty and cheerfulness. It is not time to change this, and so get color and roses in their pale cheeks, strength in their weak backs and courage in their timid souls? The women of America are pale and delicate, they may be blooming and strong, and the sunshine will be a patent influence in this transformation.—Family Visitor.

BARBER AND SALES-GIRL.

A Tender Love Romance of the Decidedly Modern School.

"My beautiful Choolie, I neffer tire of luking at your lofely hair."

The young couple sat in the elegant parlor of a hotel, enjoying a tete-a-tete. They were on their wedding tour. Julia Van Slankins, the beautiful Pennsylvania heiress, who had met the distinguished foreign nobleman, Count de Bergamot, while on a visit to her friends in the metropolis, had yielded to the impulsive ardor with which the Count pressed his suit, and after a brief courtship the two were married. Life looked blissful and romantic to the ecstatic young couple, and a future full of rose-embowered vistas, endless moonlight reveries, and the dreamy dolce far niente of far away tropical Edens, whose existence was guessed by both, but unspoken by either, rose before their rapturous vision.

The head of the beautiful bride rested confidingly on the shoulders of her husband, the noble Count de Bergamot, and at the sound of his voice she looked up.

"I am glad, my dear Count," she said, "that my hair pleases you."

Lifting the lovely head from his shoulder, the noble foreigner ran his fingers through the wavy masses of her golden hair for a few moments in silence, and then with a deferential, suggestive inflection of voice, he absently said:

"Have a shampoo, sir?"

Recovering himself as his bride looked at him with a start of surprise, he drew from his pocket a rather lean wallet, took a bank note from it and handed it to her.

"My tear Choolie," he said, "let me haf te happiness of giffing you my first present of pin-monish!"

The fair bride took the note, looked at the figures that indicated its denomination, tapped in a mechanical way on the center table, and called out in a shrill voice:

"Ca-a-sh!"—Chicago Tribune.

A friend was calling there and asked for the key, as he wished to examine some of the volumes. "On no account," said the hostess. "I had a man to come up from the book store to fit them in, and I wouldn't have them disturbed on any account."—Boston Herald.

—A society with one million dollars capital has been formed in New York City, which proposes to do a business similar to that of the pawnbrokers, offering to the poor who have to resort to such institution a safe, fair and reasonable accommodation. The intention is to establish about twenty offices in that city and ten in Brooklyn. It will be operated upon the plan of the "Mont de Piete," which is conducted by the French Government. Interest upon loans will be but ten per cent. per annum. The society will also aid the poor people who are known to the managers, or when unredeemed goods are sold, if the price realized is more than the loan and interest amount to, the amount received in excess will be paid over to the pledger.

Plague of Rats in China.

A late number of the Pekin Gazette contains an announcement that reads like one of Grimm's fairy tales. It is to the effect that it will be necessary to change certain postal routes in Outer Mongolia because of the appearance of swarms of rats. For two years past the pasturage in this region has suffered much, and last year the grass was nearly all eaten by these vermin. The whole country has been honeycombed by their burrowing. Camels and horses are suffering for food, and the courier service throughout this district can not safely be continued because the burrows are a source of danger to all mounted travelers.

Some Other Kind.

He had 'em stretched across the car for everybody to stumble over, and after surveying them for a minute a little girl turned to her ma and said:

"Is that the kind we had for dinner yesterday?"

"What, dear?"

"Why, pickled pig's feet."

He blushed and drew 'em up.—Detroit Free Press.

FOR OUR YOUNG FOLKS.

A DEAR LITTLE BRIGAND.

Oh, he is a terrible brigand
All through the long, long day,
With his crimson sash and his fierce mustache,
And his hat with its feather gay.

Yes, he is a terrible brigand,
As he hides in parlor or hall,
And rushes out with triumphant shout,
To capture Nannie or Paul.

But he is a dear little brigand
When the sun sinks low in the west,
And with sleep in his eyes he drops disguise,
Begging to be undressed.

Yes, he is a dear little brigand
When his childish prattlings cease,
And he holds my hand till he's safe in the land
Where brigands are all at peace.

THE THREE GOLD PIECES.

A Story from the Life of King Frederick the Great.

Early one summer morning, a great many years ago, a boy was lying sound asleep on a bench in one of the rooms at Sans-Souci (the country palace of the King of Prussia) with all his clothes on. Very gay clothes they were, from the trim blue jacket, with its embroidered cuffs and shining brass buttons, down to the smart shoes, with their well polished steel buckles. But the poor little fellow's face was not as gay as his dress by any means. It looked sadly pale, and as worn and tired as if he had been up all night.

So indeed he had; for tough old King Frederick, who could work from four in the morning till ten at night without seeming a bit the worse, sometimes forgot that his poor little page-boy was not as strong as himself, and would often keep him on duty till Karl fell asleep from sheer fatigue, just as he appeared to have done now.

All at once a bell rang sharply in the next room. At that signal the page ought to have jumped up and gone in to receive his orders for the day, as he had to do the first thing every morning, no matter at what hour he might have gone to bed. But he was so fast asleep that he never heard it, and the bell rang again, still more sharply, without any answer.

Then the door of the inner room opened, and out came a very strange figure, indeed.

It was a small, lean, gray-haired old man, in a shabby uniform coat and a pair of long riding-boots, which looked as though they had not been cleaned for a month; and as if he were not untidy enough already, he had smeared the whole front of his coat with snuff, which fell off in flakes when he moved.

His face might have been carved in stone, so cold and hard did it look; but in the midst of it there gleamed an eye so large and bright and piercing that it seemed to go right through every one upon whom it rested. But for this commanding glance, one would most likely have taken him for a beggar, and have wondered what business such a slovenly old fellow could have in the palace at all.

But in reality this queer, shabby little old man was no other than King Frederick of Prussia himself, the greatest General and statesman in the world, and famous throughout all Europe under the name of "Frederick the Great."

One could see by the flash of his eye and the set of his hard old mouth, as he came striding out, that he was very angry at being kept waiting, and that a terrible scolding awaited the poor little page, who lay sleeping there so peacefully, knowing nothing at all about it. But as the King's eye fell upon the lad's unconscious face, his mood seemed to change.

"Hum!" muttered he, with the very ghost of a smile flickering over his iron face. "How famously the young dog sleeps! I only wish I could have such a nap now and then. One can see that he hasn't got to worry himself about governing five millions of men, or carrying on war against five nations at once. Ha! what's this?"

A crumpled sheet of coarse paper, which seemed to have dropped from Karl's hand, was lying on the floor beside him.

The King picked it up, and these were the first words that caught his eye, written in the shaky, straggling hand of a very feeble old woman:

"I thank you much, my dear child, for the money that you have so kindly sent me, which has been a great help. Take your old mother's blessing for it, and see that you always do your best to be a worthy and faithful servant to our master the King, whom God bless and preserve."

As he read that simple message, the soldier King's grim face softened as no one had ever seen it soften before. Perhaps the memory of his own mother, dead years ago, rose up in his own mind once more; perhaps he was touched by the old woman's prayer for himself, or by the discovery that this had been the boy's last thought before he fell asleep.

"Were all my subjects like that," he murmured, "I should be the luckiest King in Europe. And so he has been saving money from his wages (and poor enough wages they are, I'm sure) to send to his mother! Well done, my boy, thou'rt a true Prussian!"

At that moment Karl moved slightly, as if about to awake.

The King noticed it, and a new idea appeared to strike him, which must have been a droll one, judging from the momentary twinkle that lighted up his stern eyes.

"Yes, that will be the best way," said he to himself, "and a fine surprise it will be for him."

Stepping back into the room whence he had issued (which certainly had very little "royal luxury" about it, for it was almost as bare as a cattle-shed, with no furniture save a battered old deal table and a broken chair), Frederick hunted in the table-drawer till he rummaged out a well-worn writing-case, from one of the pockets of which he took three gold coins.

These he slipped into the page's pocket along with the letter, taking great care not to awake him in doing so. Then he rang his bell violently, and called out:

"Karl, come here!"

The sharp, stern voice effectually roused our hero, who started up at once, and drew back in dimay as he saw Frederick's keen eyes fixed upon him.

"Pardon, your Majesty, pardon!" stammered he. "I was—"

"Never mind about that just now," interrupted the King. "Come in here and get your orders."

As Karl sprang eagerly forward to obey, the money, which had been put loosely into his pocket, rolled out again, and fell ringing and chinking upon the floor.

"Hello, young man!" cried Frederick, "you ought to be a good deal richer than I am, if you can afford to fling your money about like that."

"Oh, sire!" cried the boy, imploringly, "I don't know any thing about this money. I don't, indeed! Somebody must have meant to ruin me by putting it into my pocket, and then saying that I had stolen it."

"No," said the King, gravely, "that money is God's gift to you, to help you in assisting your mother. Write and tell her that I know all about her, and that I'll take care of her, and of you, too."

And King Frederick kept his word. —David Ker, in Golden Rule.

PRACTICE MAKES PERFECT.

The Fixedness of Habit—The Importance to the Young of Doing Every Thing Well.

Practice makes perfect, but perfection does not necessarily come from much practice. Every thing depends on the character of the practice. The oftener we do a thing carelessly, the more firmly we fix the habit of not doing that thing well—the harder we make it to do our best when need comes for the exercise of our highest skill.

Habits count for more than capacity in the conduct of life; and if our practice does not tend to make our best work habitual, so that it is easier to do well than ill, we will not be much advantaged by it.

In practical life, "well enough for the purpose" is a good rule. It is folly to put ten dollars' worth of work on a five-dollar job. We do not finish a door-yard fence as we would a handrail of our stairway inside, nor a field fence like the fence about the house. The fine skill put upon the finishing of a carriage would be out of place upon a dump-cart.

A working-drawing, or an ordinary note of invitation, or penciled memorandum, must be correct or clearly intelligible, but need not be artistic in style or finish. In all such cases it is not the doing, but the thing done, that is of importance. Doing for the purpose of self-training—indeed, for any purpose except sheer necessity in early life—comes under a different rule.

In youth, when our habits are forming, we misspend our time if we do any thing—work or play—indifferently well. There is then no "well enough" except our very best. The thing we set out to make may not be worth much when it is finished, yet we can not afford to make it badly. There is as little solid enjoyment in a piece of poor work as in a badly-played game.

Besides, if the joining made, the blow struck, or the line drawn, is not true to the best of our ability, the practice got in doing it will hinder rather than help us toward that condition of off-hand, unconscious, habitual skill fulness which is the secret of easy and successful accomplishment.

We may not have—are not likely to have—the rare gifts which constitute genius, but we may draw near to, perhaps surpass, the achievements of genius, if in all our training work we never allow ourselves in any thing to fall short of the best that we are capable of doing. Practice of this kind leads toward perfection; all other away from it.

With the high demands and fierce competition of modern life, the chances are heavily against those who are capable of third or fourth-rate work. Every avenue of life is crowded with those who can do work that is just tolerably good; but superior workers are fewer.

In every art or profession there is abundant "room at the top;" and the uncrowded workers, though few—rather because they are few—reap the lion's share of the rewards. For the products of superior knowledge and skill there is always a demand at good prices, and the first-rate man or woman commands the situation, while the third-rate goes a-begging for something to do.

When one has learned how to do superior work, and has acquired the habit of doing it as a matter of course, it is as easy to do that rapidly as poor work; and the superior worker in every field of effort receives twice, thrice, often ten times the pay of the inferior worker. This unequal pay for equal labor is the prize which the world offers for superior quality in work, and that quality is very largely the result of taking pains when working habits are being formed.

Accordingly we would say to our young friends: Don't let your pastime work train you to be "botches." You are making not playthings merely, but yourselves; and a bad job at that is the worst job you can undertake. Better be doing absolutely nothing than practicing any thing in a careless, haphazard, hit-or-miss fashion.

It is easier to learn good habits than to unlearn bad ones, and any practice that fixes bad habits—manual, mental or moral—will not pay.—C. E. Corson in Golden Days.

ADVICE FOR FARMERS.

Although Offered Gratuitously, It Should Nevertheless Be Heeded.

In early days, when land was cheap, produce of small value, expenses light and wants few, the "cut-and-cover" process was tolerable; but in modern times, when land is dear and largely sapped of its virgin fertility, taxes, labor and living high, and produce low, old methods lead to a precarious existence. It is possible to make the average farm yield double what it does now, and turn off just as much profit as usual while bringing it up to this condition. Then with land $100 an acre the man with fifty acres is doing annually $300 better than one with 100 acres, for he saves this much in interest. Till less land, till it better, do not spread a little labor over a great deal of land and manure in proportion. Remove old stumps, roots and plow-destroying boulders. Uproot briars and bushes in fence-corners and foul weeds all over the farm, and plant fruit and forest trees in waste places. Keep less and better stock and care for them with wise liberality; it costs no more to raise a good animal than a scrub; the average dairy cow makes 150 pounds of butter; it is easy to increase that to 300 pounds. Keep all stables, pens and poultry-houses warm and clean; keep buildings and fences in repair and tools housed and painted. Keep some sheep on most farms; they consume rough forage which other stock will not eat; lambs and mutton are marketable any time of year; sheep do more good, less harm and are more profitable weight for weight than other stock. Acquire the reputation in market of always having excellent products in attractive packages and all holding out equal to the sample on top; and always tell the truth.

It is not economy to sell off the young stock, for the purchaser gets all the benefit; nor to allow straw-stacks to rot down; these should be fed to stock and used in stables for litter and absorbent. Do not seed permanent pasture-land with only one or two kinds of the grasses; various kinds should be sown, those that mature early, late and between, and such as are adapted to the soil and locality, and then the surface will be all covered continuously. Do not sell hay, straw or much grain off the farm; better feed it at home. The reason the soil of England is so productive is because she not only consumes all she raises but imports large quantities of meats and cereals, and as it is a law of nature that not a particle of matter is ever lost the "balance of trade" in plant food is largely in her favor. A thoughtful farmer stood on the dock at New York when a foreign vessel grain-laden swung out into the river. "There," said he, with much truth. "America has robbed her soil of another cargo of manure to enrich the Old World." It is a mistake to permit the soil to remain bare any length of time. Nature proves that. She abhors a nude surface as much as a vacuum and proceeds to cover it with some kind of vegetation in her own slow but sure way. She can be anticipated by sowing seeds of useful plants; rye answers an excellent purpose sown after potatoes, corn, garden vegetables and other crops which leave the surface exposed. And, finally, it does not pay to make personal use of narcotics and stimulants.—Terra, in N. Y. Tribune.

The Queen's Beef-Eaters.

"Beef-eaters" is a familiar name for the yeomen of the guard, a corps organized by Henry VII. for his own protection on the day of his coronation, October 30, 1485, and which has served as a body guard of the English sovereign ever since. The word is usually derived from buffetier, but the etymology is doubtful, as the yeoman never had charge of the royal buffet or side-board. Preston ("History of the Yeoman of the Guard," 1885,) suggests that they may have received their name from a bird called beef-eater, whose strong, thick bill bore some resemblance to their partisans. Indeed, the yeomen were often referred to as "bill-men," because they carried a weapon with a hook like the beak or bill of a bird. The tower wardens, an entirely different body of men, are uniformed like them, and popular parlance classifies them all as "beef-eaters."—American Notes and Queries.

The celebrated authoress, so highly esteemed by the women of America, says on pages 103 and 445 of her popular work "Eve's Daughters; or, Common Sense for Maid, Wife and Mother":

"For the aching back—should it be slow in recovering its normal strength—an ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER is an excellent comforter, combining the sensation of the sustained pressure of a strong, warm hand with certain tonic qualities developed in the wearing. It should be kept over the seat of uneasiness for several days—in obstinate cases for perhaps a fortnight."

"For pain in the back wear an ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER constantly, renewing as it wears off. This is an invaluable support when the weight on the small of the back becomes heavy and the aching incessant."

EXCURSION RATES FROM ALL POINTS.

The treatment of many thousands of cases of those chronic weaknesses and distressing ailments peculiar to females, at the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y., has afforded a vast experience in nicely adapting and thoroughly testing remedies for the cure of woman's peculiar maladies.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the outgrowth, or result, of this great and valuable experience. Thousands of testimonials, received from patients and from physicians who have tested it in the more aggravated and obstinate cases which had baffled their skill, prove it to be the most wonderful remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women. It is not recommended as a "cure-all," but as a most perfect Specific for woman's peculiar ailments.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, it imparts strength to the whole system, and to the womb and its appendages in particular. For overworked, "worn-out," "run-down," debilitated teachers, milliners, dressmakers, seamstresses, "shop-girls," housekeepers, nursing mothers, and feeble women generally, Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the greatest earthly boon, being unequaled as an appetizing cordial and restorative tonic.

As a soothing and strengthening nervine, "Favorite Prescription" is unequaled and is invaluable in allaying and subduing nervous excitability, irritability, exhaustion, prostration, hysteria, spasms and other distressing, nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease of the womb. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a legitimate medicine, carefully compounded by an experienced and skilful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate organization. It is purely vegetable in its composition and perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the system. For morning sickness, or nausea, from whatever cause arising, weak stomach, indigestion, dyspepsia and kindred symptoms, its use, in small doses, will prove very beneficial.

"Favorite Prescription" is a positive cure for the most complicated and obstinate cases of leucorrhea, excessive flowing, painful menstruation, unnatural suppressions, prolapsus, or falling of the womb, weak back, "female weakness," anteversion, retroversion, bearing-down sensations, chronic congestion, inflammation and ulceration of the womb, inflammation, pain and tenderness in ovaries, accompanied with "internal heat."

As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at that critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The Change of Life."

"Favorite Prescription," when taken in connection with the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and small laxative doses of Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets (Little Liver Pills), cures Liver, Kidney and Bladder diseases. Their combined use also removes blood taints, and abolishes cancerous and scrofulous humors from the system.

"Favorite Prescription" is the only medicine for women, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

Large bottles (100 doses) $1.00, or six bottles for $5.00.

FOR PRESIDENT,
BENJAMIN H. HARRISON,
OF INDIANA.

FOR VICE-PRESIDENT,
LEVI P. MORTON,
OF NEW YORK.

SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1888.

The National Convention.

After a session of six days, and on the 8th ballot, Monday, General Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, received 544 votes, and was then declared the unanimous choice of the convention, amid great enthusiasm. Hon Levi P. Morton, of New York, was nominated for Vice President on the first ballot.

With this ticket and the admirable platform adopted by the convention, we should, and we honestly believe we will be successful in the coming election.

BENJAMIN H. HARRISON.

Sketch of Our Candidate for President

General Benjamin Harrison, son of Hon. J. Scott Harrison, and grandson of President William Henry Harrison, was born at the home of his grandfather, North Bend, Ohio, August 20, 1833. He was thus seven years old when his distinguished ancestor was elected President of the United States, in 1840, on the Whig platform of protection for American industry. He graduated at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, in 1852, when he was nineteen years old, with high honors. He began the study of law in Cincinnati, and a year after his graduation he married Miss Carrie L. Scott, of Oxford, whose acquaintance he had made while in college. In 1854 he commenced the practice of law and settled in Indianapolis. He soon rose to distinction in his profession, and gained prominence as a successful lawyer. In 1860 he was a candidate for reporter of the Supreme Court of Indiana, and after many joint debates with Governor Hendricks, was elected, In July, 1862, having taken an active part in raising the Seventieth Indiana Regiment, he was elected and commissioned colonel by Governor Morton, and at once went into active service in Kentucky, Tennessee and elsewhere with the Army of the Cumberland. During his absence the Democratic Supreme Court declared his office vacant, but in 1864 he was re-elected by a large majority.

He served in the army until the close of the war, attaining the rank of Brigadier General, and receiving high commendation from his commanding general.

When the war was over he resumed the practice of law, in which he became well known throughout the State, and was often engaged in the most important law suits occurring in the West. In 1876 he was induced, much against his inclination, to accept the Republican nomination for governor, but was defeated, although leading all other candidates on his ticket.

In 1880 he headed the Indiana delegation at Chicago, where he combatted the "third term" movement, and was largely instrumental in bringing about the nomination of Garfield. In the campaign of 1880 he was very active, and the Republicans gaining the ascendency in the legislature, he was elected to the United States Senate, where he served six years with distinction. In 1884 he was often spoken of as an available nominee for the Presidency; but he declined to allow his name to go before the convention. In that campaign the Democrats, coming into power again, made an infamous gerrymander of the legislative districts of the State by which they supposed the election of a Republican Senator was rendered impossible. But in 1886 the Republicans, under the leadership of Harrison, and the main issue being the question of his re-election, elected their State ticket, as well as a majority of the legislature; but one of the houses, being Democratic, unlawfully expelled Republicans enough to give themselves a majority of two on joint ballot, and thereby defeated the will of the people and elected Turpie.

This year, delegates favorable to the nomination of Harrison had been chosen in every congressional district in the State of Indiana, and the State convention instructed the delegates-at-large to exhaust every honorable means to secure his nomination. Thus Indiana was solid for her favorite son,

Sketch of the Nominee for Vice-President.

Levi P. Morton, the nominee for vice-president, is descended from George Morton, one of the Puritan fathers who landed at Plymouth, New England, in 1632, and is a son of the Rev. Daniel Morton. His birthplace was Shoreham, Vermont, where he first saw the light on May 16, 1824. Having a strong preference for a business career, when 16 years old he was placed in a country store. By the time he attained his majority he was made a partner by his employer. In 1849 he removed to Boston, where he was admitted as a partner in a wealthy mercantile firm, his good fortune being due to his ability alone, as he had neither adequate capital nor influential friends to gain him the promotion. Five years after he made New York his residence, and opened a place of business in that city. Prosperity attended him, and in 1863 he founded the banking houses of Morton, Bliss & Co., New York, and Morton, Rose & Co., London.

Mr. Morton was elected to Congress from the eleventh district of New York in 1878 as a Republican. His majority was over 7,000 votes. He was re-elected two years after. President Garfield nominated him as minister to France, which was unanimously confirmed by the Senate in March, 1881. The vacant seat thus created in the House of Representatives was filled by Roswell P. Flower, after a memorable contest. Mr. Morton was recalled from France by President Cleveland.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM.

The Grandest Document Ever Presented by Any Party.

The Republicans of the United States assembled, by their delegates, in National Convention, pause on the threshhold of their proceedings to honor the memory of their first great leader, the immortal champion of Liberty and the rights of the people, Abraham Lincoln, and to cover also with wreaths of imperishable remembrance and gratitude the heroic names of our later leaders who have more recently been called away from our councils—Grant, Garfield, Arthur, Logan, and Conkling. May their memories be faithfully cherished. We also recall, with our greetings and with prayers for his recovery, the name of our living heroe, whose memory will be treasured in the history both of Republicans and of the Republic, the name of that noble soldier and favorite child of victory, Phillip H. Sherdian.

SYMPATHY WITH IRELAND AND BRAZIL.

In the spirit of these great leaders and of our own devotion to human liberty, and with that hostility to all forms of despotism and oppression which is the fundamental idea of the Republican party, we send fraternal congratulation to our fellow Americans of Brazil upon their great act of emancipation which completed the abolition of slavery throughout the two American continents. We earnestly hope that we may soon congratulate our fellow citizens of Irish birth upon the peaceful recovery of home rule for Ireland.

EQUAL RIGHTS AND A FREE BALLOT.

We reaffirm our unswerving devotion to the National Constitution and to the indissoluble union of the States; to the autonomy reserved to the States under the constitution; to the personal rights and liberties of citizens in all the States and territories in the Union and especially to the supreme and sovereign right of every lawful citizen, rich or poor, native or foreign born, white or black, to cast one free ballot in public elections and to have that ballot duly counted. We hold the free and honest popular ballot and the just and equal representation of all the people to be the foundation of our Republican government and demand effective legislation to secure the integrity and purity of elections, which are the fountains of all public authority; we charge that the present administration and the Democratic majority in Congress owe their existence to the suppression of the ballot by a criminal nulification of the constitution and laws of the United States.

PROTECTION WITH A BIG P.

We are uncompromisingly in favor of the American system of protection. We protest against its destruction as proposed by the President and his party. They serve the interests of Europe. We will support the interests of America. We accept the issue and confidently appeal to the people for their judgment. The protective system must bemaintained. Its abandonment has always been followed by general disaster to all interests, except those of the usurer and the sheriff. We denounce the Mills bill as destructive to the general business, the labor and the farming interests of the country, and we heartily endorse the consistent and patriotic action of the Republican representatives in Congress in opposing its passage. We condemn the proposition of the Democratic party to place wool on the free list, and we insist that the duties thereon shall be adjusted and maintained so as to furnish to that industry. The Republican party would effect all needed reduction of the National revenue by repealing the taxes upon tobacco, which are an annoyance and burden to agriculture, and the tax upon spirits used in the arts and for mechanical purposes, and by such revision of the tariff laws as will tend to check imports of such articles as are produced by our people, the production of which gives employment to our labor, and release from import duties those articles of foreign production, except luxuries, the like of which cannot be produced at home. If there shall still remain a large revenue than is requisite for the wants of the government, we favor the entire repeal of the internal taxes rather than the surrender of any part of our protective system at the joint behest of the whisky ring and the agents of the foreign manufacturers.

FREE AND ADEQUATE PROTECTION

CONTRACT LABOR AND TRUSTS.

We declare our hostility to the introduction into this country of foreign contract labor and of Chinese labor—alien to our civilization and our Constitution—and we demand the rigid enforcement of the existing laws against it, and favor such immediate legislation as will exclude such labor from our shores.

We declare our opposition to all combinations of capital organized in trusts or otherwise to control the condition of trade among our citizens, and we recommend to Congress and the State legislatures in their respective jurisdictions, such legislation as will prevent the execution of all schemes to oppress the people by undue charges on their supplies, by unjust rates for the transportation of their products to market. We approve the legislation by Congress to prevent alike unjust burdens and unfair discriminations between the States.

PUBLIC LANDS.

We reaffirm the policy of appropriating the public lands of the United States to be homesteads for American citizens and settlers not aliens, which the Republican party established in 1862 against the persistent opposition of the Democratic party in Congress, which has brought our great Western domain into such magnificent development. The restoration of unearned railroad land grants to the public domain for the use of actual settlers, which was began under the administration of President Arthur, should be continued. We deny that the Democratic party has ever restored one acre to the people, but declare that by the joint action of Republicans and Democrats about fifty millions of acres of unearned lands originally granted for the construction of railroads have been restored to the public domain, in pursuance of the condition inserted by the Republican party in the original grants.

We charge the Democratic administration with failure to execute the laws securing to settlers title to their home-steads, and with using appropriations made for that purpose to harrass innocent settlers with spies and prosecutions under the false pretense of exposing frauds and vindicating the law.

ADMISSION OF TERRITORIES.

The Government by congress of the Territories is based upon necessity only, to the end that they may become States in the Union. Therefore, whenever the conditions of population, material resources, public intelligence and morality are such as to insure a stable local government therein, the people of such Territories should be permitted, as a right inherent in them, to form for themselves constitutions and state governments and be admitted into the Union. Pending the preparation for statehood all officers thereof should be selected from the bona-fide residents and citizens of the Territory wherein they are to serve. South Dakota should of right be immediately admitted as a State in the Union under the constitution framed and adopted by her people, and we heartily endorse the action of the Republican Senate in twice passing bills for her admission. The refusal of the Democratic House of Representatives, for partisan purposes, to favorably consider these bills, is a wilful violation of the sacred American principle of local self-government and merits the condemnation of all just men. The pending bills in the Senate for acts to enable the people of Washington, North Dakota and Montana Territories to form constitutions and establish state governments should be passed without unnecessary delay. The Republican party pledges itself to do all in its power to facilitate the admission of the Territories of New Mexico, Idaho and Arizona to the enjoyment of self-government as states, such of them as are now qualified as soon as possible, and the others as soon as they may become so.

THE MORMON CHURCH.

The political power of the Mormon Church in the Territories, as exercised in the past, is a menace to free institutions, too dangerous longer to be suffered; therefore we pledge the Republican party to appropriate legislation, asserting the sovereignty of the Nation in all Territories where the same is questioned, and in furtherance of that end to place upon the statute books legislation strong enough to drive the political from the ecclesiastical power, and thus stamp out the attendant wickedness of polygamy.

A SOUND FINANCIAL POLICY.

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money and condems the policy of the Democratic administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

We demand the reduction of letter postage to one cent per ounce.

AID TO FREE SCHOOLS.

In a Republic like ours, where the citizen is the sovereign and the official the servant, where no power is exercised except by the will of the people, it is important that the sovereign, the people, should possess intelligence. The free school is the promoter of that intelligence which is to preserve us a free Nation. Therefore the State or Nation, or both combined, should support free institutions of learning, sufficient to afford to every child growing up in the land the opportunity of a good common school education.

OUR AMERICAN MARINE.

We earnestly recommend that prompt action be taken by Congress in the enactment of such legislation as will best secure the rehabilitation of our American Merchant Marine, and we protest against the passage by Congress of a free ship bill as calculated to work injustice to labor by lessening the wages of those engaged in preparing materials as well as those directly employed in our ship yards. We demand appropriations for the early building of our navy, for the construction of coast fortifications and modern ordnance and other improved modern means of defense, for the protection of our defenseless harbors and cities, for the payment of just pensions to our soldiers, for necessary works of national importance in the improvement of harbors and the channels of internal coast wise and foreign commerce, for the encouragement of the shipping interests of the Atlantic, Gulf and Pacific States, as well as for the payment of the maturing public debt. This policy will give employment to our labor, activity to our various industries, increase the security of our country, promote trade, open new and direct markets for our produce, and cheapen the cost of transportation. We affirm thisto be for the better of our country than the Democratic policy of loaning the Government's money without interest to National banks.

THE FOREIGN POLICY.

The conduct of foreign affairs by the present Administration has been distinguished by its inefficiency and its cowardice. Having withdrawn from the Senate all pending treaties affected by Republican administrations for the removal of foreign burdens and restrictions upon our commerce for its extension into better market, it has neither affected nor proposed any others in their stead. Professing adherence to the Monroe doctrine it has seen with idle complacency the extension of foreign influence in Central America, and offering trade everywhere among its neighbors it has refused to charter, sanction or encourage any American organization for constructing the Nicaragua canal—a work of vital importance to the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine and our national influence in Central and South America and necessary for the development of trade with our Pacific territory with South America and with the islands and further coasts of the Pacific ocean.

THE PROTECTION OF AMERICAN FISHERIES.

We arraign the present Democratic administration for its weak and unpatriotic treatment of the fisheries question and its pusillanimous surrender of the essential privileges to which our fishing vesssls are entitled in Canadian ports under the treaty of 1818, the reciprocal maritime legislation of 1830 and the comity of nations and which Canadian fishing vessels receive in the ports of the United States. We condemn the policy of the present administration and the Democratic majority in Congress towards our fisheries as unfriendly and conspicuously unpatriotic and as tending to destroy a valuable national industry and an indispensible resource of defense against a foreign enemy. The name American applies to all citizens of the redublic and imposes upon all alike the same obligation of obedience to laws, and at the same time that citizenship is and must be the panoply and safeguard of him who wore it, and protect him, whether high or low, rich or poor, in all his civil rights. It should and must afford him protection at home and follow and protect him abroad in whatever land he may be on a lawful errand.

A SIDE WIPE AT THE MUGWUMPS.

The men who abandoned the Republican party in 1884 and continue to adhere to the Democratic party, have deserted not only the cause of honest government, of sound finance, of freedom and purity of the ballot, but especially have deserted the cause of reform in the civil service. We will not fail to keep our pledges because they have broken theirs, or because their candidate has broken his. We therefore repeat our declaration of 1884, to-wit: The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under the Republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law, to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all Executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.

PENSIONS TO UNION SOLDIERS.

The gratidude of the Nation to the defenders of the Union cannot be measured by law. The legislation of Congress should conform to the pledges made by a loyal people and be so enlarged and extended as to provide against the possibility that any man who honorably wore the Federal uniform shall become an inmate of an alms house or dependent upon private charity. In the presence of an overflowing treasury it would be a public scandal to do less for those whose valorous service preserved the government. We denounce the hostile spirit shown by President Cleveland in his numerous vetoes of measuees for pension relief and the action of the Democratic House of Representatives in refusing a consideration of general pension legislation.

In support of the principles herewith enumerated, we invite the cooperation of patriotic men of all parties and especially of all working men whose prosperity is seriously threatened by the free trade policy of the present administration.

New York Sun, (ind.:) "Harrison is not a great man or a great political genius, but nobody need believe that he is an insignificant candidate. Everybody who has ever belonged to the Republican party can support him—Stalwarts, half-breeds, Blaine men, Conkling men, all can take Harrison without any sacrifice of feeling. * * * * Levi P. Morton having been absent as minister to France during the whole period of Garfield and Arthur's administration, he is not involved in the bitter factional fights of that time, and there is nothing in his nomination to interfere with the conciliatory qualities of General Harrison. It is a respectable ticket all through. We wrrn the Democrats that they will have to put forth their best efforts and bring out their utmost strength. It is no sham battle."

The grandfather of our Presidential nominee 48 years ago ran against a man from New York, who was after a second term, the issue being the same as now, the tariff. William Henry Harrison defeated this man from New York, who was after reelection and who advocated a low tariff. Now, 48 years later, we have the grandson of William Henry Harrison pitted against another man from New York, who very much desires re-election and the issue is practically the same as in '40. The parallel does not cease here, either. Our Harrison will be elected, as was his grandfather and the man from New York will be snowed under, as was Van Buren.

Blaine to Harrison.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., June 26.—General Harrison last night received the following from Mr. Blaine:

Linlithgow, Scotland, June 25.—General Harrison, Indianapolis: I congratulate you most heartily upon the work of the national convention. Your candidacy will recall the triumphant enthusiasm and assure the victorious conclusion which followed your grandfather's nomination in 1840. Your election will seal our industrial independence as the declaration of '76, which bears the honored name of your great grandfather, saved our political independence.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, June 25, 1888.—Everybody, including not a few Democrats, is praising the grand platform unanimously adopted by Chicago convention. It breathes victory. Hon. W. D. Kelley, often referred to as "the father of the House" says: "It will carry all the doubtful States of the North, and give us a fair fighting chance for Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee and Kentucky." The opinion of Judge Kelley is concurred in by every Republican with whom your correspondent has talked. This platform is one of the grandest political documents ever put forth, as embodying the views of a party. Every Republican in this broad land should feel pr ud o the good work done by the representatives of the party in convention assembled. Before this letter is in print the telegraph will have informed you of the nomination of the convention for President and Vice-President. They are sure to be our strongest men. The delegates who got up this platform can make no serious mistake, and, after all, with such a glorious declaration of principles, it matters little who the candidates are.

Cleveland has again wrapped himself in the mantle of Civil Service Reform, after having trampled it under foot for months. He has secured the nomination, and now he wants to do a little posing to catch the votes of such Mugwumps as George William Curtis. But the people have long ago seen through the hypocrisy of Mr. Cleveland. Four years ago he succeeded in fooling some very good people, but he will never do it again.

Since the St. Louis Convention Washington has been overrun with New York Democratic politicians, and the most of private secretary Dan. Lamont's time is taken up by conferences with these gentlemen.

The subject matter under discussion is doubtless the political situation in New York State. There are rumors that Cleveland intends to keep Governor Hill out of a nomination, because he dared to allow his name to be used as a prospective presidential candidate. Some say that Cleveland's candidate for Governor will be ex-Mayor Grace, of New York City, and others that private secretary Lamont is the favored individual. My own impression is that Cleveland will not quarrel with Hill—he dare not, but if he can get him to retire by promise of future honors, he will probably be very glad to do so.

Here's a specimen of Cleveland's boasted moral courage: Through the influence of a real estate syndicate of this city, Congress passed a bill appropriating $30,000 to build a new and ornamental bridge over a creek, which runs near Mr. Cleveland's country residence, near this city. There was no necessity in the world for this appropriation. There was a good substantial wood bridge already over this creek, and the idea of building a new $30,000 bridge would never have been heard of if the real estate syndicate before mentioned had not bought all the property adjacent to Cleveland's place on the other side of the creek. Clevelann knew that this appropriation was made for the benefit of speculators and himself. Did he veto the bill? Not he. Neither had he courage enough to sign it. He allowed it to become a law without his signature. Had it been a bill giving a pension of $4 or $5 a month to the poor widow of some soldier, he would have vetoed it quick enough.

News from the Chicago convention has been eagerly sought after and discussed here, since it has been in session. At the capitol but little else was talked about. The secretary of the Senate received dispatches which were bulletined on a temporary blackboard put up in his office for the purpose. In the main corridor of the House the Western Union put up bulletins, both places were crowded whenever the convention was in session, the Democrats seeming to be as deeply interested as the Republicans.

The Senate has passed a bill appropriating $40,000 to pay the expenses of having the Government department represented at the Columbus, Ohio, Centennial exposition, in September and October.

Senator Frye has presented his report in favor of the river and harbor bill. It appropriates more money by $2,800,000 than any other similar bill ever passed by Congress. The bill is almost certain to pass the Senate.

The Nebraska Representatives gave the rascally special agents of the General Land Office a terrible scoring in the House Wednesday.

The House having finished with the general appropriation bills, will now resume the fight on the Mills bill.

General Sheridan continues to get better, but the improvement is so slow as to be almost imperceptible, except when you compare his present condition with that of two weeks ago.

Then may all the fine adornments of French and music grand
In the future be completed by a right artistic hand.

And when this structure's finished, and the storms of life descend,
May faith in a loving Saviour its walls and towers defend;
And may all the kindly benefits of Truth and Love allied,
Within its walls of beauty forever more abide.

OAKLAND, MD., June 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR:—During my last trip to Oakland I was glad to notice the general spirit of renovation as regards the cleaning of our streets. The enterprise that is manifested in the removing of the box that is tattered and torn, and the bag that is burnt and worn, and the general sweepings of morn from the buildings that our town adorn, is a source of congratulation, but the good work and this dirt of uncertain description and fragrance is not carried on quite far enough. Why should those offensive heaps of litter be allowed to remain before our store doors, for the wind to hurl not only under the feet but in the very faces of our towns people and visitors? There should be no half-way doings about this admirable branch of industry. While to the uncultivated eye these heaps of litter may present an appearance charmingly quaint, by those whose motto is "Cleanliness is next to Godliness," such spectacles in our streets are offensive to good taste; and not only so regarded by our own people, but visitors who come for pure air and tidy walks point the finger of scorn at our thoroughfares, and taunt us with aggravating remarks concerning some accumulation of "abomination of desolation." The only available walk from the North-western part of the town to the hotels was looked upon last summer with horror and aversion. It was simply a pit-fall for the unwary. No one wishes to discourage sweeping and cleaning, but rather let us promote this landable activity one degree further. Let the useless paper box follow the antiquated tin-can. Let the disabled yeast powder bottle join the tricky old barrel hoops. Let them all be banished. Let the trash at our doorways be driven forth to perish. Let the heaps of rubbish be clean put away from among us. Let them die as it were, "unwept, unhonored and unsung." Then shall the visitor admire and the resident rejoice. Then shall Oakland, as a body politic, as well as strangers pronounce our town the sweetest, cleanest and purest of mountain resorts.

AN INTERESTED CITIZEN.

Friendsville.

Spring has come and gone since we last wrote you.

We are having some very hot weather at present.

Crops are generally looking well. Wheat is beginning to change color, indicating an early harvest.

The fruit yield will most likely be ligh this year, especially cherries.

Bainess is about as good as usual this tme of the year.

Thee is but little excitement as yet over election matters. Hope it may so continue.

Our town is still improving. We will soon have another large store building in the place. There are other improvements of minor importance. Mr. Isaiah Friend, of Elder Hill, is also building a new house.

We saw Dr. Rogers, of Moundsville, W. Va., pass through this place last week enroute to Selbysport.

Mr. Louis Vansickle, of Blooming Rose, is not expected to live.

Mrs. Chas. Liston, of Selbysport, is quite low also.

Mrs. Polland, an aged lady, also of Selbysport, is quite poorly at this writing.

Our esteemed fellow-citizen, Mr. R. T. Frazee and his estimable wif, returned the 3d inst. from their visit to Sharpsburg, Md. While they were gone they took in the Decoration ceremonies at Antietam National Cemetery, near the above named place, and visited the battlefields of Antietam. Mr. Frazee brought home with him a fine collection of pieces of shell, grape shot and bullets from these historic battlegrounds. Mr. Frazee's brother, J. T. Frazee, one of Garrett's heroic sons, is buried in Antietam Cemetery. Including Mr. J. T. Frazee there are 90 of Maryland's noble sons buried in those beautiful grounds, where their graves are strewn with flowers regularly. Mr. Frazee is loud in his praises of the site, the condition of the grounds, and of the kindness of the people generally. He makes special mention of the name of Superintendent Geo. Hess, whom he considers a gentleman in the strictest sense, and he says he has no fears as to the care of the dead there buried while Mr. Hess is superintendent, and so assures all who have friends buried there. He says he expected to find everything looking nice, but it was all beyond his anticipations. The aged mother of R. T. Frazee is well known in this community and though she is well stricken in years, she has never forgotten the time when she bade her son good-bye, when he went away to fight for his country never more to return, and it is gratifying to her to know that he rests in a place of such great beauty awaiting the resurrection morn, when the dead shall arise incorruptible. This cemetery was dedicated September 17th, 1867, and at present contains more than 4,700 of the Nation's dead, representing 19 States. Mr. and Mrs. Frazee's many friends in Garrett are glad but not surprised to know that they were so kindly received and entertained during their visit.

Please pardon us for our lengthy letter this time, but remember your readers had a respite of several weeks, however.

HOMOEOPATHY. — 3077 patients were treated at Ward's Island Hospital, N. Y., in 1876; the death rate was 6.07 per cent and the cost of medicine 43½ cents. During same year 5,651 patients were treated at Bellvue Hospital, N. Y., with death rate of 12.03 and cost of medicine per patient $1.46. At Ward's Island the treatment is Homœopathic, at the last it is not. Surely these official figures should open peoples eyes to the folly of ignoring Homœopathy, the only school of medicine in the world on the Rock of Natural Law, on which alone, humanly speaking, life and health are safe. HOME COMFORT RANGE.

Wrought Iron Range Co.

St. Louis, Mo., U. S. A.

We come among you as business men, conducting a straight forward, legitimate trade, giving in all cases full value for the money and have but one price and never deviate from it. A small boy can purchase one of them from us as cheap as any one else.

WE SELL OUR RANGES FROM WAGONS ONLY,

The agents of this Company are not allowed, under any circumstances, to misrepresent anything pertaining to the sales of their Ranges. They are not working on commission, but are paid a regular standing salary, hence they could have no object in misrepresentations. We adopted the plan of delivering our Ranges at the homes of our purchasers for the better accommodation of such purchasers, and the more readily to introduce an article becoming more and more a household necessity.

We employ in all cases men who can bring the best recommendation as to character, sobriety, &c. We own our own teams, instruct men to pay all bills promptly, and endeavor in all cases to transact business in such a manner as will continue to increase our sales.

We accept notes in full or part payment, and when due send our own men to collect them, going to each party indebted to us individually.

WE DO NOT SELL, BARTER OR DISPOSE OF THESE NOTES,

under any circumstances. Any person indebted to us, desiring to pay the same, can find his note in our possession, at our office in St. Louis, at any time before maturity.

No Range in the world is made of such as is the Home Comfort, the body and ovens are made of the best refined soft steel, tempered specially with a view of its working and durable qualities. The body is in one piece, only one seam behind and well riveted with Norway rivets and the oven is in one piece, thoroughly riveted. Parts not steel—fire lining and top plates—are made of the Finest Quality of Malleable Iron,

SUBSTANTIAL AND LASTING MATERIAL

and can not be broken. Our Water Backs are made of malleable Iron, thus insuring them against cracking. The ovens being of Wrought Steel nothing dries up when cooking, as is the case in all cast iron ovens. All flues are asbestos lined, thereby saving twenty-five to fifty per cent. of fuel.

We claim that a

Home Comfort Range will Last a Lifetime.

We naturally feel as though we were really benefiting mankind by the introduction of Home Comforts and naturally aid in making happy and comfortable homes.

THE BABY ANARCHIST.

Around the house all day he goes,
By baby fancies led;
He sometimes stands upon his toes,
And sometimes on his head.

He takes the flower, pot and all,
And puts it in his lap;
He spills the syrup in the hall—
This naughty little chap.

Your silk umbrella spick and span,
He sticks in deep rat-holes;
And with his mother's rarest fan
Hammers your frailest bowls.

He ties the pendulum with a string
While singing baby songs;
He's always sure to put one thing
Where something else belongs.

He'll take a match and light the cat,
He'll paint the poodle's head;
And pour frail crackers in your hat
And leave them in your bed.

Adown the register he'll throw
The spools with nimble wrist;
He's often wished in Jericho—
The Baby Anarchist.

But never war upon him wage,
Nor whip him till he roar—
Suspend him in a roomy cage,
Five feet above the floor.

'POTHECARY'S FOLLY.

The Clergyman's Satisfactory Solution of a Strange Case.

The country town of Twentyford was early in the century the scene of the spasmodic effort of local patriotism, which produced the "Folly," a building which, perhaps, only owes its survival to the need of a historic fact to mark that such patriotism ever existed.

A wealthy apothecary, being persuaded that a certain spring in the neighborhood contained all the principal ingredients of the pharmacopœia, built a bath-house on a scale that should have proclaimed to far and near the natural attractions of Twentyford. Having done so he slept with his fathers, and his heirs and assigns were left to discover that it takes other ingredients besides those of a chemical nature to assure the reputation of a spa.

The apothecary had traveled, and in so doing had acquired a taste for Moorish architecture. The bath-house profited by many a minaret. But he was also of a frugal mind, and having launched out in an unwonted indulgence of his favorite tastes in design, it became necessary to steer his course somewhat differently in the matter of the intended material, which he changed from stone to wood, painted a dull red for the sake of a "rich and quiet effect." The result did not appeal as it might have done to the minds of the inhabitants who ungratefully styled it "Pothecary's Folly."

That solitary bath-house, however, was to become the scene of one strange event in the commonplace history of the town.

The cider apples were red on the trees, the hop gatherers singing in their loaded wagons, and a wholesome smell of brewing in the air lent an additional hospitable and comfortable feeling to our usually comfortable county on the morning in question, which rose, as like its fellows as nature could make it, when Twentyford awoke, hearing a rumor, pricked its ears, rubbed its eyes and listening again discovered that a shabby and unobtrusive Frenchwoman had been murdered in one of the bath-rooms of the "Folly."

She was a sort of amateur commercial traveler who sold French flowers to shops and had passed the previous night at a small inn in the town. She had been heard to complain of "le rheumatism," being, as the landlady said, "about the only Christian thing she had said."

But she had proceeded to cure her ailment by a bath in the saline spring, an act which the worthy landlady would by no means have approved. Perhaps it was the commercial failure and general neglect by the great world of the "Folly," which had brought the springs into such discredit that every inhabitant who respected himself would have endured the racking and twinging of every joint rather than have recourse to the baths. Perhaps so; greater minds are influenced by like considerations. "Anyhow, the woman died—what else could one expect?" My aunt and I, quiet folks as a rule, even for Twentyford, were mixed up in it, in so far as there was but the length of Pear street between us when the prisoner was apprehended. We saw but the backs of the only two policemen for miles round, and (how they came to be there at that moment no one knows!) with something or somebody between them, and were told that we should receive a subpœna as witnesses. To my aunt this information was full of terror. "My dear," she said, "I shall never forget how your poor uncle's nerves were upset by the unprincipled young counsel who examined him about that most disagreeable soap boiling business. He said—your poor uncle, I mean—that we were inundated by 'bluebottles' from the horrid-smelling works, and they asked him if he was quite sure it was not black bottles or brandy bottles he meant, and, if so, wherein they differed from a bluebottle! Disgraceful treatment it was, and what we had suffered from those insects no one knows! I think Ellice, we will just turn into Slatter's for that pink ribbon I wanted; we may perhaps hear what really has happened."

Mr. Slatter said "the prisoner was a young lady of 'prepossessing appearance;' it was thought, by one of his 'young ladies,' that perhaps the prisoner was a 'flower hartist,' too, and that perhaps professional jealousy afforded a motive for the crime,'" but the opinion did not find favor; the "young lady" ranked professional zeal at a romantically high figure.

We gathered at last that the police had taken her up because there was no one else they could take up—a very sufficient reason; that is to say, no one whom they had not "known from a baby," and were therefore able to vouch for any thing they might do or say in reason of course; "gettin' a bit lively Saturday nights, burning ricks, breaking into shops," etc., "but this 'ere ain't reasonable." The police were probably right; they had not imagination enough for the kind of crime.

The police had been summoned, instantly too, it appeared, by the cries of the "attendant," who, unaccustomed to duty in that capacity, had returned—soon after admitting the murdered woman to the bath-room—from the washtub, which habitually claimed her attention in her own cottage.

Astonished at the silence which greeted the application of her ear to the key-hole, she opened the door, which was guiltless of lock or bolt, and found the unfortunate woman lying on the floor with her throat cut, and a "queer big kind of knife lying beside of her, and all her rattle traps and them big red and yellow flowers out of her pack all strewn about; lor! bless ye, they did flatter the natural flowers, they were that beautiful; thinks I to myself she've killed herself sure, but the perlice ought to see to it, so I 'ollers and screams with all my might, and ye knows the rest, Miss——"

"Aunt," I said, on my return from walking on the afternoon of that day, "how can we give witness against this unfortunate young creature? I would as soon suspect myself. I have seen her."

"You, how?"

"Only a passing glimpse in a close fly; they were taking her to W—— jail. But the face I saw was terribly sad, with a scared look in it, and no wonder; but no trace of violent passion or mean cruelty; it was a delicate, even beautiful young face, very pure in outline, and very pale."

"She was apprehended a little way from the garden door of the bath-house, you say?"

"Yes, looking 'dazed like,' the policeman said," I replied. "I can understand his using the expression now that I have seen her."

Nothing further occurred for about a week, when we received a visit from a stranger. My aunt could hardly be persuaded to see him, so certain did she feel that his visit must be connected with this disagreeable affair. For my own part I was anxious to hear any thing that would throw light upon it. "If he is," I said, "he may, perhaps, see the uselessness of mixing us up in it. We had better see him."

We found a clergyman, Mr. Edward Holdfast, chaplain of W—— jail, a tall, thin man with a worn but kindly face.

"You have come, I hope," said my aunt, "to set us free from the disagreeable and, I may say, absurd position in which we find ourselves. I will not answer for the consequence if I am taken to a stuffy court and made to say all sorts of things, when I know nothing. My poor, dear husband——"

"Quite so, my dear madame," said Mr. Holdfast; "the evidence is most unsatisfactory, and I propose taking some steps which may save—mind, I only say may save, in the event of my experiment proving successful—all necessity for a public trial. Could you make up your minds to being present at a private examination of the witnesses and the prisoner, conducted on the scene of the —the—at the bath-house?" Without waiting for the tremulous negative on my aunt's lips, he continued, "I can elicit nothing from the prisoner, but she steadily repeats when questioned, 'I know nothing of a French-woman and nothing of a murder,' and once she said: 'Send for my father,' and then correcting herself hastily—'But no—it would kill him to find me here!' So she refuses her address. We have advertised, of course, though she does not seem to see the necessity of accounting for her presence in this neighborhood."

"Then," interrupted my aunt, "you think, as we do, that it is impossible this poor young lady can be really guilty."

But Rev. Edward Holdfast had not been chaplain of a jail without learning how to keep his own counsel.

"It is not for me to pronounce any opinion, but," he continued, "I am sure neither you nor your niece will refuse what assistance you can render to a lady of delicate nature like yourselves, who, if innocent, should be spared the horrors of a public trial of this kind."

We secretly questioned the legality of Mr. Holdfast's inquiry, still more so its efficacy. But not daring to entangle herself in arguments of a legal nature, my aunt wisely acquiesced, and promised to appear on the following day at the bath-house. This really was very brave of her, all things considered, but the appeal to her humanity had conquered, I thought. I could form no satisfactory conclusion as to Mr. Holdfast's intentions. The idea of a suicide had been flatly contradicted by medical evidence at the Coroner's inquest; it had been clearly proved impossible for such a gash to have been inflicted by the woman herself. Perhaps Mr. Holdfast doubted this, and wanted by examination of the place to prove the contrary; but this could certainly have been done without our assistance. Did he wish to watch the effect of the terror of the place on some other person he suspected? There was something very unpleasant in the thought of assisting at such a scene. Did he hope that the prisoner's unaccountable silence might be broken, and that, face to face with the scene, she would continue a denial that could not but carry conviction into the minds of those who would have to witness against her? But no, it was idle to surmise; the determined restraint and silence, beyond just what he had chosen to communicate, formed a complete barrier to his intentions.

"She must be bailed out," said my aunt, "otherwise no one would allow her to appear, and who can have bailed her except the chaplain himself?"

I timidly suggested it was hardly a bailing matter.

"He seemed fearfully anxious for her escape; did you see how his face worked and twitched? He was nearly flying out at me when he thought I wouldn't come. I was too frightened to say no, that was the fact; not frightened, of course, but it is awkward to have gentlemen getting into rages in one's own drawing room."

"Yes, aunt, the china!"

"Don't talk nonsense, Ellice. It's my impression, though you pretend he wasn't excited, that if he can't bit on a plan of clearing that young woman he'll elope with her! He has a pretty woman in tragic circumstances on his hands, and he means to save her somehow; what better method——"

"If he thinks her innocent," I reply, rather staggered at my aunt's extraordinary idea. It was certainly true that he had appeared terribly anxious, that he had suppressed his anxiety with conscious effort; he had the traces of sleepless nights and strong emotion on his face, but the fate of a human being was hanging in the balance, and natural humanity, quickened by the sacred nature of his office, was enough, I thought, to account for unusual feeling.

"Don't tell me," continued my aunt, "that if she were not a pretty girl there would be so much fuss in that man's mind: it isn't his business to say who's guilty and who's not, and to my mind he is very little fit to do either."

On the afternoon of the day appointed my aunt and I found ourselves at the "Folly." We crossed the large central room, originally designed for the pump room, now used as a young men's institute, and well supplied with illustrated papers of extreme antiquity. It opened on an unroofed turf inclosure, intended as an exercising ground for patients occupied in assimilating the mineral waters, but it usually served as drying ground for the "attendant's" linen. There was no linen there to-day, however. Instead were two benches accommodating the already assembled witnesses, and beyond was the fatal bath-room. I hardly dared look toward it, so near was still the horror of the place. We took our seats among a mixed assembly of gaping farm laborers, one or two tradesmen, and ladies. There was a conspicuous absence of any of the gentlemen of the neighborhood. Did Mr. Holdfast fear that his proceedings might be called in question? Hardly any one spoke beyond slight and almost inaudible greetings to their friends. The clergyman stood near the entrance of the inclosure, leaning against the palisade; he bowed his thanks for their attendance to those who came in. He looked more worn than ever in the glare of daylight.

There was a moment's pause after every one was seated; then across the green inclosure walked alone the tall figure of "the accused." Without looking either to the right or to the left she sat down at the further end, near the bath-house. There was no conscious shame visible on her still face; no anxious gaze upon the faces of those who could, perhaps, save or slay her. With her hands tightly clasped together, and her eyes fixed on the ground, she sat still as a statue. Mr. Holdfast left the door and came toward us. I then remarked another peculiarity of his. His eyes, which were very deep set, seemed to have the power of comprehending a whole scene and every individual in it at a glance. One felt certain that had he closed his eyes after an absolute momentary survey he could have distinctly described every person in it, even down to their minutest article of clothing. He repeated twice, only twice, in a low tone as he walked along the line: "When I go into the bath-house have the kindness to follow me," yet every individual understood distinctly whether the words had or had not been addressed, without his even having apparently looked directly at any one. I noticed afterward those thus chosen were those on whose self-control he could probably place the most reliance.

He began an address to us by reminding us of the solemnity of the occasion and of the difficulty of the duty before us in rather set fashion, as if he felt some hesitation over his unwonted task and took refuge in mannerisms. This, however, was soon shaken off; his words flowed freely and his voice rang clear, yet still nothing to the point of the matter on hand, no information in fact. I was sensible of a certain impatience. I had not come there to be harangued with platitudes.

"We might have known we should be let in for a sermon when we had a parson at the head of affairs," whispered a live[illegible] little lady at my elbow.

Hush! his voice had a different tone in it. He was describing the awfulness of sudden death; lower and more impassioned came his words. I would not spoil them by garbled extracts. It was impossible not to listen intently. Scorn and anger flashed out as he spoke of the dastardly cowardice that could strike a harmless victim. Then, with a pathos I had never heard equaled, he described the grief of the unknown sorrow-stricken ones, who might be left to mourn their loss. Suddenly he stopped, and the abruptness made me look up; his eyes were fixed on the prisoner's—then he said hurriedly: "We are ignorant of much that surrounds the history of this awful crime; all that we have to connect us with the victim lie here." He threw open the large door and disclosed the bath-room, whose concrete floor sloped upward from the entrance on account of the occasional overflowing of the spring; on it lay a hat and cloak, belonging to the murdered woman, and the much-talked-of Paris flowers, scattered about just as they had been left.

Mr. Holdfast stooped and picked up a large pink flower. The fixed eyes of the prisoner followed his, then she rose and went slowly toward him—we followed according to his direction. Was she—were we going to examine minutely the dreary horrors of the place?—enhanced by the mockery of those tawdry flowers. The door had been closed upon us, and the room was almost dark; what light there was straggled in through the rough venetian shutters. We stood, huddled together, about the door, the accused woman standing alone in the middle of the room. A beam of light struck something glittering on the floor. I could hardly repress my inclination to call for the shutters to be opened—the twilight was almost painful—yet I felt that Mr. Holdfast would not have permitted any thing, unless he had some design in choosing it to be so.

The tall figure in the center bent down and picked up the shining something and and raised it high above her head; it was a long knife of peculiar construction. At last the silence was broken, and she was about to speak—but no! the sounds that came were more like moans than articulate words; the sounds grew louder, they rose and fell like an Indian chant, while she whirled the long knife slowly round and round her head. Two or three of those nearest her rushed to the door; the sudden light revealed Mr. Slatter, the draper, whose curiosity was as great as his cowardice, suspended, like Mohammed's coffin, between earth and heaven, his body and legs safe outside, and his head still stuck in round the door.

I could not have moved if I had wished it; that whirling blade fascinated me, yet the sight of Mr. Slatter made me laugh.

But the voice was rising louder now. I could hear, or thought I heard, these words:

"The east wind blows, it brings a word;
Awake! my blood-bedabbled sword.
The word's a spark that lights a flame,
Was kindled at a noble name
Which coward Death, from Rumor heard,
Then, wake and rise, Avenging Sword!"

At the last line her voice rose to a wild scream, and she ran in a frenzy toward the bath. Just at this moment the door was opened from the outside and an old man with streaming gray hair rushed in. Mr. Holdfast went to meet him, and laid his hand on his arm. The old man shook him off.

"My daughter! where is she? Who dares accuse her of hideous crimes?"

"Herself," answered the clergyman, "and yet not herself."

He took the old man gently aside and endeavored to calm him and tell him what had passed.

The old man turned his head, and when the clergyman had ceased speaking he came forward to us, with a gesture full of dignity.

"My friends—this gentleman, to save my daughter from a shameful death, has proved her—mad. The frenzy could only be reproduced by restoring the outward circumstances of the last, the fatal one. I thank him for the attempt. I thank you for your presence here. Had there not been the semblance of a trial to set her suspicions at rest, it might have failed. Yet think of the awful fate reserved for one who during long intervals is as conscious of her condition as yourselves!"

He was hardly able to go on, but turned to Mr. Holdfast.

"You meant it for the best—the best no doubt, but was not any death better than—such a fate?"

"Nature is kinder than we, in our ignorance, can be," he replied; "she has finished the work she began—your daughter's death." * * *

We learned afterward that the poor girl had gone mad from the shock of hearing of the death of the man to whom she was shortly to have been married. He had been murdered by dacoits in Burmah, and his last letter to her, which she never could be induced to part with for a moment, had been much occupied in describing the luxuriant growth of tropical flowers which surrounded their future home out there. After the terrible news she remained for a week without noticing any one, scarcely tasting food; then they missed her.

Some strange connection must have haunted her at the sight of the gaudy flowers of the poor pack woman, whom it was afterward remembered she had been seen to have followed all the previous day.

Mr. Holdfast's interest had first been aroused by the lady's likeness to a relation of his own who had died insane. The idea occurred to him as a possible solution of a strange case, and he tried the experiment at the express wish of the prison authorities.

My aunt says: "It really is a comfort to know there were two policeman and a doctor in that hateful dark bath-room. I'm sure I wonder you didn't all die of fright." And she draws a little red worsted shawl round her and shivers in a way that reminds me strangely of a little bird.—F. Somers Day in Belgravia.

INDEPENDENCE DAY.

SLOWLY the sun creeps up into the sky,
Gilding the hill-tops
with his ruddy hand,
And from the heavens,
in pompous majesty,
Proclaims the break of day throughout the land.

And, as he soars into the vaulted space,
A thousand guns their sombre greeting roar;
A million bells their
jangle interlace,
A people's shout breaks forth from shore to shore.

Ashout whose joy, half psalm and half prayer,
Rings far out over the encircling seas;
And, as its echoes sift the trembling air,
The Stars and Stripes fly out upon the breeze.

That matchless flag, whose silken folds enroll
All that is noble in a splendid race—
Firing with pride each patriotic soul,
And marking Freedom's flash from place to place!

Peal on, ye bells! Flash forth, ye beacon-fires!
Ring out, ye cheers from loyal bosoms hurled!
Rise, waiting minstrel, tune your eager lyres,
And sing a Nation's birthday to the world!

The day that checked a tyrant's ruthless hand
That vainly strove to stay a people's will—
The day when chains became as ropes of sand,
When Freedom spoke and all the world stood still.

Let the Nations sing of pomp and war,
Of bloody conquest, battles fought and won—
[illegible] goes swelling from afar
[illegible] hails to meet the rising sun,

This how a Nation, born 'mid deadly strife,
Lives in a glory that can never cease,
And seeks through all the coming years of life
Naught save a splendid reign of lasting peace.

HURRAH FOR THE FOURTH.

The Fourth of July as a holiday fills
Its measure of pain and of joy,
Afflicting the man with its manifold ills,
Delighting the soul of the boy.

When bombs and torpedoes are tearing the air,
And rockets are soaring on high,
No wonder the nervous folks shiver or swear;
But hurrah for the Fourth of July!

'Tis sad at a time of such blistering heat
To shut yourself tight in the shell,
To keep out the terrible din of the street
And the odious sulphurous smell.

When the small boy alone is abroad in the land,
When old people tremble and fly
From the shots and the shouts and the bray of the band,
Then hurrah for the Fourth of July!

When midnight at last draws a vail o'er the scene,
And the firing no longer we fear,
How restful the thought, and how sweetly serene,
That it comes only once in a year!

As our glorious forefathers suffered and died,
We suffer, although we don't die;
But we look from the past to the present with pride,
And hurrah for the Fourth of July.

The tumultuous ranks of the boys of to-day
Our guards of the future supply,
And liberty grows in that riotous way;
So hurrah for the Fourth of July!

CROSSING THE LINE.

The Story of One Fourth of July at Sea.

[Written for This Paper.]

To see my spare spars at the present time and view the jury-mast I wear for a back-bone, around which my summer gear flaps idly in the sultry breeze this warm weather, you would scarcely suspect that I lay claim to being an old Jack-salt. Why, running rigging may need overhauling and my old hull be a little the worse for wear, my boy, but you may punch my top-lights, if I can't reef, hand, steer, box the compass or shift the quid equal to any old sea-dog of your acquaintance. I am one of Neptune's sons, legitimately baptised in the equatorial bowl on the Fourth of July almost twenty years ago. Those were days when the rich merchants' son had no better chance to crawl aft through the cabin windows than did the son of a poor fisherman's widow. Both commenced their nautical career as boys before the mast and fought their way upward and won promotion according to their merits. Nowadays, the rich man's son passes an examination at a naval academy and takes his different degrees like a collegiate landswab until he is declared proficient in navigation. Had their nautical educations been acquired in the good old-fashioned way, there would be less bones bleaching in the caverns of the sea and less widows mourning for brave Jack-salts, who have lost their lives through the ignorance of the kid-gloved navigators of modern days.

But I am getting ahead of my tow-rope! I started to tell you about a Fourth of July at sea on board an American merchantman. Dash my topsails, boys! it makes my blood tingle with pleasure to think of the good old days when my blood was made to tingle by a rope's end. It don't seem to be more nor yesterday since I made my first voyage round the cape—bu'st my stunsils if it does!

It was along the latter part of June, two or three years after the war, when our clipper left the Victoria docks in Liverpool. We made good headway until we struck the "hoss" latitudes, and you may keelhaul me for a land-lubber if we didn't stick just north of the line for almost a week.

NEPTUNE ON HIS THRONE.

About six bells on the dog-watch one night an old tar on the lookout sang out: "Ere we goes!" The watch on deck all make a break for the lee rails, and, sure enough, we could see a slight wake astern; and, on looking aloft, the royals, that had swung listlessly from their yards in the vertical sun for a week, gave vent to dismal creaks as they yielded to the pressure of the breeze against their canvass.

"Man the weather braces!" hurriedly exclaimed the captain, as he looked over the port quarter. "Taut the lifts and hoist the staysails," he said to the mate.

For a few minutes every thing was apparently in a bustle and confusion. An occasional "yippchay! yahdu!" and a bowline song, as a timer for the sailors to pull together, then the tramp of our bare feet as we shuffled along the decks, and all was still. As we boys coiled down the ropes for the night we noticed the lower sails were filling and the breeze was stiffening fast.

"Dublin," said the skipper to one of the men, "we will cross the line on the Fourth of July if this breeze holds out. I haven't met with old Neptune for several cruises now. I wonder if he will pay us a visit during the dog-watch to-morrow?"

"I shouldn't be surprised, yer honor," replied the tar, touching his cap.

"How many of his children have we aboard who have not seen their father?" questioned the captain.

"Six, besides the boys, making eight, yer honor."

"You'd better see that the font is ready for the old man when he comes, hadn't you?"

"Right you are, sir;" said Dublin, as he turned and walked forward.

During the remainder of the dog-watch seven or eight of the oldest of the crew congregated near the main-hatch and held a whispered consultation.

At eight bells, as the watch was about to change, the man on the lookout sang out: "Light on the weather bow!"

"Where away?" hollowed the mate from the quarter-deck, aft.

"Two points th' windward, sir."

Just then a fog-horn was heard on the weather bow, although the night was clear and the water like a sea of glass.

"Ship ahoy! Throw me a burline and take me in tow; I want to come aboard," came in stentorian growls from over the ship's head.

"Who are you?" asked the mate.

"Got any fresh-water swabs aboard? If you have, I want to see 'em."

"It dun be ole Neptune, hisself!" exclaimed the cook, who had stepped outside his galley to find out the cause of the noise. "Good Lawdy! He dun shabe dis niggah, shuah!" and he disappeared in the galley and fastened the slide.

A tall, muscular-looking being with a vermilion-hued countenance clambered into the ship's chains, then swung himself over the bulwarks and dropped inboard. A piece of sailcloth round his waist was his only covering, unless a massive beard and a luxuriant growth of hair could be reckoned as such. His hirsute development around the head was a dirty yellow, and contrasted strangely with the black growth on his chest and well-tanned arms. Several india-ink sketches on his forearms seemed somewhat familiar to me, and when he spoke it was with a slight brogue which made me wonder if Neptune was a native of Irish seas. As he handed his triton to "Hinglish 'Arry," a sailor in the port watch, I thought I recognized it as the ship's grange, with which we harpooned dolphins.

"Stir round, ye lubbers, an' rig oop er shake-down fer mesilf an' the ould woman," he said, as he assisted his wife to the deck. "Bear er hand, yees divils, an' be loively!"

The "ould woman" was modestly attired in a yingy tarpaulin and a heavy switch of gulf stream sea-weed, and from the muscular development of her arms I rather thought the "ould man" would be likely to come off second best in a hair-pulling match. The mate took them in tow, and they went aft to pay their respects to the skipper, and there remained until the next morning.

It was my watch below in the morning, and on being routed out at noon I noticed a peculiar commotion outside my cabin, which was just forward of the steward's pantry. About four bells, as the wheel changed hands, I heard sounds of laughter, and on ascending to the deck I found old Neptune seated on a throne that had been improvised for the occasion from boxes covered with sailcloth. His majesty was perched on a coil of new rope and the "old woman" sat complacently by his side, occasionally squirting a fine jet of tobacco juice on the tarpaulin beneath her. The sergeant-d'arms of this marine court looked suspiciously like Boston Ben, our boatswain; but as his face was plentifully bedaubed with vermillion and black streaks, the principal resemblance between them was confined to a long scar on the right cheek and the lack of a starboard glimmer.

"Bring on ther super," roared his majesty, and I felt myself seized from behind by two pair of strong arms and blindfolded. My next sensation was that of being carried up a rickety platform, where I was released after having my hands tied behind me.

"Phawts yer name?" asked the voice of old Neptune.

Not knowing what might be the result if I refrained from answering, I opened my mouth and essayed to reply. As a consequence, I had my mouth stopped with a plug of oakum saturated with soap and pepper.

"Ther dival's doomb. Shure, he can't talk troo his whiskers. Figaroo, ye spalpeen, coine here wid yer moog an' razzer. Phawt d'ye mane, yer yeller landswob, ter be coomin' ter soy yer faithur widout yer binnacle scraped! Bad cess ter ye fur er grane tarrur, ov Oi don't think yer afthur nadin' a shompo."

A shout of merriment arose from those of the crew who stood by, for in as little time as it takes to tell it, the barber had smudged my face with a tar-brush and given me two rakes with a razor made from the hoop of a harness-cask; and no sooner was this operation ended when my hat was removed, and on being replaced on my head an avalanche of dirty lather spread itself through my hair. The soapy extract trickled down my forehead beneath my bandage and filled my eyes. Between the pepper in my mouth and the soap in my eyes I was nearly frantic; but as my hands were securely tied I could not help myself, and each breath I inhaled half strangled me with pepper. I felt a coarse finger thrust in my mouth, and the oakum plug was removed just in time to prevent my swallowing it to escape suffocation.

"Where war ye barn?" questioned my woolly-mouthed tyrant.

Any attempt to reply would have been drowned in a stream of water that struck my face at the time. The water afforded a much needed relief for the space of half a minute. The next instant after I recovered my breath I heard my tyrant say:

"Misther Super is afther falin er little phaint, (ecther; havré yees e'er er pill erbout yer ganzy?"

"Aye, aye, yer honor," said a voice I recognized as the steward's.

"It's betthur yer give wan uv thim ter the clark; it's er little grane arbout ther gills, he is. He's after nadin his grog-tomb cooled off."

I opened my mouth to catch my breath for a cough, and if my reader has ever seen and smelt the compound known as soap-grease, he can imagine the nature of the ball of slush which the doctor kindly gave me for a pill. I sputtered, hawked, choked and swallowed amid hilarious shouts from my highly-amused audience.

"Ye air er thrue barn sailor, me hearty, so ye air; an' it's peroud Oi am ter own yees fur er son, Misthur Clarruk. Yer'll be er credthit ter tha sarvice whin ye air boptoized. Now, ye raslets, yees kin christen Mr. Super in tha font."

His varlets quickly took their cue, and I was grabbed by the shoulder and feet and, poised in the air.

"Oi boptoise yees in ther name av Davy Jones, Ould Mither Carey and the Floying Dootchman; an' may yees niver be afther bringing baad luck ter tha clipper that'll sail yees."

With a splash I lit face down in the "font," which was the long-boat filled with salt water for the occasion. My hands had been untied, and I quickly felt my feet, and tore off the bandage from my eyes. A dozen buckets of bilge water handed me from as many different directions, and I clambered out the boat to the deck in a partially drowned condition.

"Bravo, my hearty!" said Henglish 'Aury, at my elbow, "you stood it like a bloody trump. There's good stuff for a sailor in you, sure pop. Go aft and shift your togs; then come back and bear a hand at baptizing the rest of the greenies. You're an old tar now, you know."

I went aft and "shifted my togs," and, after a severe scrubbing, I succeeded in removing the greater part of the tar from my face; but distinct traces of it remained in light brown streaks long after I reached our port of destination, Calcutta.

Out of respect to my position on the ship I had received the first initiation, that it might give me a chance, should I choose, to aid in the baptismal ceremonies of the other unfortunates who had never before crossed the line. But I had no heart to take an active part in the subsequent proceedings. Recollection of my own discomfort deterred me from it. During the afternoon the sun waxed hot and old Neptune, in attempting to scratch his head, dislodged his wig of oakum which rolled to the deck and discovered the bullet-cropped pate of Dublin Dan. The "ould woman" turned out to be Demara Dick, who chafed his arms where they were blistered in the sun and swore he never would play lady again for all the sport to be had on the high seas. Plum duff was served as extra rations and each watch was given a bottle of grog to drink to the health of the Government under whose flag they sailed—the glorious Stars and Stripes. A cracked violin, a maimed banjo and a broken-keyed concertina furnished music in the evening, and the motley crew, of most e'l nations, joined themselves in the enjoyment and celebration at sea of the birthday of liberty for American people—the never-to-be-forgotten Fourth of July. A MARRYING RACE.

The Unromantic Way in Which the Turks Select Their Brides.

In Turkey every body marries young, and, one might perhaps be permitted to add, those who can afford it marry often. Such a thing as an old maid is absolutely unknown among the Turks. They are a marrying race, and as a general thing the girls are married off by the time they reach their teens, and often a year or two before. A Turk may possibly fall in love with his wife after their marriage, but it wouldn't be very easy for his affections to antedate this ceremony, for the first time he ever sets eyes on her face is in the nuptial chamber, after the wedding guest having retired. When a young Turk becomes old enough to marry, then his mother and a few confidential female friends undertake to find him a wife. In a body they call upon such of their neighbors as are blessed with marriageable daughters and state their mission in a business-like way. The daughters are trotted out for inspection much as though they were young colts or calves offered for sale. The wife hunters look the daughters over critically, question the mother and partake of coffee. In a few minutes the daughter that has been inspected retires from the room. If her appearance has failed to please the visitors nothing more is said. If, however, they are favorably impressed, they linger and enter into negotiations for her hand in marriage to the youth in question. The girl's age, health, accomplishments, trousseau and kindred matters are inquired into in the most matter-of-fact way. The mother of the damsel, on her part, inquires quite as minutely into the merits and demerits of the proposed husband.—Troy Times.

DOCTORS, PLEASE ANSWER.

Information Which the Public Has Sought from Time Immemorial.

I wish some one would explain to me why doctors—whether consciously or unconsciously—cause our passing ailments to become such a source of revenue to the druggist. If one has an acute attack of—well, say bilious colic—the M. D comes, and besides the necessary equipment of rubber water bags, and flannel, and mustard plasters, and flaxseed poultices, there is a bottle of red liquor (price fifty cents) for nausea, and a white one for aiding digestion (price seventy-five cents), and a box of powders for relieving pains (price seventy-five cents). The next morning the medicine is changed. The bottles, with only a couple of teaspoonfuls gone from either, are put aside, and more seventy-five and fifty-cent bottles ordered in. The next day these (still three-quarters full) are put away and a dollar bottle of tonic and a box of pills brought in. Two days after, the tonic—still only half consumed—is set aside, another dollar bottle of a different tonic substituted, with the addition of a box of powders. While that relay of medicine is still to the front the patient gets well and goes down town. He has on hand a druggist's bill of about six dollars, two-thirds of which is for the medicine "remnants" which he can only throw away. Now, surely the physician had some conception how many doses the patient would need of each awful notion, and why every time write out for one stomach a prescription which would suffice for a hospital ward!—Chicago Journal.

A BASE BALL umpire dreamed that one of his decisions was contested, and the subsequent proceedings were so realistic that when he awoke next morning he found the pitcher's nose broken.—Drake's Magazine.

THE GLORIOUS FOURTH.

Ring out, ring out ye merry bells,
And let the deep-mouthed cannon roar,
Each patriotic bosom swells,
The glorious Fourth is here once more.

When night descends, what joys are his!
The hissing rocket cleaves the skies;
Hark! hear the Roman candle fizz,
Behold the red and blue light rise.

Now, whizz! z-z-zip! bang! torpedoes crash
And split the fretted ear of night;
Fire-crackers jump, toy pistols flash,
'Mid exclamations of delight.

Now blaze the barrels smeared with tar,
Slow matches pass from hand to hand,
And salve and sticking plaster are
At druggists' stores in great demand.

"THE WILD BUFFALO."

How It Was Tamed and Caught--A Fourth of July Romance.

[Written for This Paper.]

OLLIE CLOSE and Judith Capell were studying by the open cottage window. It was the last study-hour in the morning and they were rivals in rhetoric, so each worked silently at the task of memorizing and adapting, giving the other only an occasional and preoccupied glance. Mollie swung herself in the single rocking-chair of their sitting-room; but Judith huddled on a stool, and grooving her cheek against the window-frame, projected her lesson through the college shrubbery.

At once there was a tearing of rose bushes and a man's bearded face at the window. Mollie ran screaming to the other end of the room, and Judith recoiled until she lost her balance on the cricket.

"Let me help you up," he said, extending a good humored hand.

"Oh, its Colonel Montgomery," said Judith. "I can help myself, thanks; but now you've got me a mark for talking in study hours."

"I'll go to the president and take it on myself."

The cottage was an additional dormitory a stone's throw from the main building. The Colonel's carriage stood at the gate. Mollie Close sat back in the room eyeing him with displeasure. But Judith kept her cricket and audaciously saw her reflection in the Colonel's eyes. She was small, hair brown and curly, supple and cat-like in motion or repose, and with an air of evenly-balanced daring and incredulity.

"You played exceedingly well at the concert last night," said the Colonel.

"Yes; my life depends on doing well. You better go away and let me get my lesson now. And be sure to say good-morning. You didn't say good-morning when you poked your head into the window."

"Good-morning, ladies." The Colonel took off his hat and kept it in his hand. "Pardon my abrupt ways."

"Mollie and I call you the wild buffalo," observed Judith, gazing sincerely upon his light whiskers. "You look so shaggy and tramp around on the flower-beds so."

"I think you're polite, Miss Capell!" burst from Mollie's indignant lips.

"There, I've made you speak, and you'll get a mark, too," said Judith, in a satisfied tone.

"Well, if I'm a wild buffalo," said the Colonel, smiling, "you must lasso and dispatch me."

"I have dispatched you, but you don't go."

"Let me hear you say your lesson."

She placed the book in his hand.

"Didn't the president tell me when he introduced me that you were a Kentuckian?"

"That question is not in my rhetoric."

"But it's in my mind. The name of Capell, you know," suggested the Colonel. "I'm Southern myself."

"Are you!" exclaimed Judith. "O, why did I ever call you a buffalo!"

"Probably because you like to laugh," said the Colonel, indulgently. "You'd turn any thing to ridicule. Even me."

She drew forth a brass button on a ribbon which she wore around her neck.

"That's a medal for the girl who can make the most fun. I've carried it a week, and if you were only about where I could make you an object lesson for the girls, that button would never depart from me."

THERE WAS A TEARING OF ROSEBUSHES.

"Can't we make such an arrangement?" suggested the Colonel.

"If you've come to that cross-mark made with a thumb-nail at the end of the lesson you may give me back the book," said Judith.

"Just one more question. You aren't an orphan?"

"Of course I am, and you knew it. And on that account the president doesn't feel responsible to anybody about me. So you can stand and amuse yourself with me just as much as you please, and I can give you pert answers, and my mother won't be told."

"Good morning, ladies," said the Colonel, lifting his hat gravely and kindly, and crunching back among the rosebushes.

"Now you have done it!" exclaimed Mollie Close, with the asperity of a sharp-featured blonde. "You've made me speak out and I'll tell you what I think of you."

"Do," said Judith, the flush around her eyes becoming emphatic. "I saw your nose tilt up and I knew you were busy getting something ready."

"You act horridly, Judy Capell. You've talked through a window and broken study-hour, but that's nothing. You've flirted. I never stoop to that."

"For good reasons."

"I'm engaged, and I have some respect for myself."

"I shouldn't have much for myself if I'd quailed as you did before that blessed buffalo. You're a coward."

"I hope I may remain a coward, then."

"You can't help it. Cowardice is constitutional in scrawny dyspeptics."

"Thank you, Miss Capell."

"Entirely welcome, I am sure."

Mollie turned her back, and they both studied vigorously.

"She blames me," said Judy to the widow, dropping her book, "because I stood between her and what frightened her?"

"Did you speak, mademoiselle?"

"Yes, I did, mademoiselle. You called me Miss Capell twice hand-running, and I wouldn't stoop to call you Miss Close!"

"You said I was a scrawny dyspeptic."

"You said I flirted."

"Well, you did flirt—you flirted scandalously."

"And you know you're scrawny. And don't you have to take pepsin after every meal!—and the whole school knows how it acts on your temper."

"I should like to have a few undisturbed moments to myself this morning," said Mollie Close, holding her book in trembling claws. "I shall go into the bed-room, and if you try to follow me I shall lock the door."

"Follow you! I wish I might never set eyes on you again."

"So do I. Heartily. Our friendship is at an end."

Miss Close walked into the bed-room.

"I shall ask to have my room changed at noon," she observed. "And I'm going to take down my dresses and fold them right away."

When she had been engaged in this improving labor long enough to be mollified by recollecting the successful recitation she had made in the blue dress, and discovering some forgotten caramels in the pocket of another, a pecking began upon the door, which increased to pounding. Miss Close heard it not. She continued folding her wardrobe ready for departure.

"May I come in, Mollie?"

"I said if you tried to follow me I should lock the door."

"O don't lock the door! It's all my fault. We never quarreled in our lives that it wasn't my fault."

"Well, Judy, you are to blame. And you annoy me more than I can endure."

"I know I do. I'm so horrid! Do forgive me. I ache more than I can stand."

"Come in, then," granted Miss Close. "I really haven't any right to keep you out of the bed-room."

Judy came in downcast, with glowing lips and eyes, and gazed at her chum.

"I wish I wasn't so hungry to be liked," she said, suppressing a sob. "There'll never be any body that likes me enough."

"We bring our troubles on ourselves in this world," observed Miss Close, in that didactic tone which always chilled the opine of her more ardent friend.

At that point, the president's pert little daughter, who, sometimes, condescended to carry cards, rushed in with a bang, and projected an oblong bit of white at Judith Capell.

"Miss Capell, Colonel Montgomery's been waiting in the reception-room to see you this long while, and if you don't hurry in Sally Smith will begin her noon practice hour there, and you can't hear your ears for the noise."

Just after the simultaneous thunder which the entire boarding-school produced by drawing their chairs to sit down to dinner, Miss Close said to her friend:

"And what did the wild buffalo want in his to-be-continued?"

"He wanted to enliven my deadly vacation here by taking me to Newark to see the Fourth of July parade."

"I suppose any proposition he makes will be agreeable to you," said Miss Close, sitting upright with the disapproval of another's admirer, which even pattern girls will sometimes manifest. She shot plates past herself like shuttles as they came from the carver's hands.

"You judge from your own former anxious standpoint," replied Judy. And she added with the passionate pessimism of Julth, "but I'm with Hamlet myself. Neither man nor woman will ever be any thing to me again. And I will never, never worry any more about any one's framework or digestion or engaged affections."

Still, when commencement bustle was over and the lonely ache of vacation had begun in Judith's solitary heart, when empty rooms echoed, and she dared not practice in minor chords for fear of sobbing herself, it gave her a throb of unconfessed delight to sit beside the Colonel on the Fourth of July morning. He drove slender-limbed, black horses from the blue grass region. His entire turnout was an ornament to the landscape, and that landscape was an ornament to the State. There were green hills melting against the sky and valleys downy soft with verdure. Dense ranks of dewy fern brushed the carriage wheels, and bits of wood views opened to and receded from the eye like enchantment.

Judith's gloved hands were folded on her white lap. It was the year when hats of cactus braid were introduced, and she wore one with poppies bunched above her face. The brilliant and defiant young face kept its side curve toward the Colonel.

"I put the question to you now because I can't wait any longer," said the Colonel.

"I don't want to be engaged," said Judith. "Engagements reduce the sum of human happiness."

The Colonel laughed.

"My roommate got herself engaged to a man, and it spoiled her. I have seen the folly of such things, and I am going to carve out my future."

"You dear child, you couldn't carve a good-sized roast. And a future is a tough thing to tackle. I have a great big heart for you, my darling, and its lonesome like you are."

"Oh, I'm not lonesome," said Judith, lifting an indifferent chin. "I always feel myself in good society with Miss Capell."

The Colonel laughed again.

"Well, Miss Capell, you know considerable about me. And I have every thing to give you that a woman could ask for."

"And you think you have nothing to do but help yourself to me," said Judith, turning on him. "You think you can pick me up half in pity, give me the name of Mrs. Montgomery, pet me awhile, and then drop me for your smoking and your men's clubs. I've seen men's patronage of wives. I've seen enough of half devotion. I don't like men. I won't marry one."

"Don't you want to be loved?" pressed the Colonel, still unable to suppress his laughter.

"Yes—O, yes; I'm going to have a dog as soon as I can feed him. I want to be adored."

"I adore you. Now, seriously, I have not been able to think of any thing else since the evening I first saw you. I'll make you a good husband. Look me in the eyes. Don't mind my abrupt ways. I'll wait ten years or I'll marry you in an hour, which ever you dictate."

Judith sat awhile and watched him guide his horses, and then she gazed over him steadily. Tears were in her eyes.

"You know I'm going to throw myself into your arms at last, because I can't help liking you," she said.

"My darling!" said the Colonel, tenderly.

"But don't my-darling me too quick. It will make me wicked to love you all. I can love you, and not feel sure you would give your life for me in return."

"But I would give it."

"You wouldn't give one day. This is the Fourth of July. Now, I'm going to try you. I shan't ask out four things of you. If you call any of them absurd or impossible, I won't believe in you, and I'll never put myself in your hands."

"All right," said Colonel Montgomery. "Test me all you please."

"Well, there. There's something for You to do now," exclaimed Judith, indicating the carcass of a calf which lay unburied not far from the road. "People are always saying what a nuisance such a thing is, and yet they leave it lying there to taint the world. Get a spade and bury it."

The Colonel came near remarking that it was a hot day for such employment; that they might ruin the parade; that he was not the owner of the calf, and that the surrounding atmosphere was not fit for a lady to linger in. Silently, however, he tied up his horses in the shade, and handed Judith out to a secluded seat upon a log. Then he went to the nearest farm-house and borrowed a spade. He chose a spot near the calf and excavated with a vigor which soiled both boots and hands. Occasionally he went several rods away and breathed, when earth began to cover its own his task became easier. He finished it, tramped back across the field with the spade, and they resumed their ride.

HE EXCAVATED WITH A VIGOR.

An expression of intensity came out on Judith's face. The Colonel showed a quiet smile, but he kept an alert and brightened eye upon her.

Without much talk thus they rode on to Newark.

The procession was already moving in the principal streets; a gorgeous pageant full of banners, flower-garlanded carriages, brass bands, the sweet faces of children and the gray heads of honored old men. Behind this array came a motly gang of human rag-bags, masked and playing pranks, mounted on lean nags.

Small boys exploded fire-crackers on the pavements. Cannons boomed as they had been booming since daybreak. The crash and extravagance of a typical Independence Day stirred all of Judith's blood with delight.

"Go and take that old woman to a safe seat," said the girl, suddenly. "She will get hurt."

The old woman indicated was a professional beggar, who had chosen the curb as her best vantage ground.

The Colonel beckoned to a colored man and paid him silver to stand at his horses' heads. Then he went to the old woman, and with her formed the center of a dense crowd which thronged close to hear him argue with her. She was deaf, blind, dumb and palsied by turns. She was lame, she was liable to fall in a fit. A five-dollar bill would not move her to any other seat, but when his bid reached ten dollars she let him lift her, and hobbled on his arm to a chair within a barber's shop, where he gave her an additional five dollar piece and paid the barber to let her stay, lest she should return to her perch and his task would have to be repeated.

Part of the crowd took him for a tender-minded philanthropist, and gave him advice as to where he might soak his head. Others inquired if she was his long-lost mother, and a lot of boys clamored after him for fire-crackers, promising to move in any direction he indicated.

Without a word he returned to his carriage. He had just taken up the reins when cries arose from the procession; with lightning swiftness space opened for a frantic horse, and it flew, dragging the rider by the stirrup.

"O catch that horse!" screamed Judith. She would have given her life to take the words back as the Colonel sprang from her side. She wrung her hands and cowered down upon the floor of the carriage, seeing him tossed and dragged at the bridle. She hid her face and prayed alone as people instinctively do in utter helplessness. The thuds and the raging clatter ceased; an already excited multitude shouted, and she raised her face to see the Colonel stepping up beside her. He was covered with dust; one coat sleeve was torn off. He had a bruise above his eye.

"There's your horse," he said, tilting his head toward the runaway. Plenty of men now held and soothed it, and a stretcher was already provided for its injured rider. He was to be taken to the hospital.

Judith set quite still beside the Colonel as he turned his horses away from the procession.

"Well, that's three," tallied the Colonel. "Only one more."

"And I'm going to ask that now."

"Let a fellow breathe," suggested the Colonel, "and get himself repaired. The business houses are all closed. I can't even get a coat. So we must hunt for dinner in some inconspicuous spot."

"I won't let you breathe twice till I ask the last thing," said Judith. "I love you now with all my might. I love you for patience. I love you for gentleness. I love you for heroism. My heart will burst, I love you so!"

"This is hard," murmured the Colonel, "when I can't even kiss your hand before this crowd."

"Never mind. My soul is on it's knees kissing your hands. And we have the years—"

"Yes, we have the years!"

"But the last thing I shall ask will be hardest of all. And it is never to mention these tasks that I set you again."

"Why, that's no task at all."

"I think, may be, it might be in the long run," said Judith, sagely, "for some men, but not for you. I will remember them. I will remember them as four great labors."

"Of the wild buffalo," said the laughing Colonel.

Then, having turned into a deserted street, he bent over and received her kiss.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—Linseed, fed to the fowls in summer, tends to improve their appearance and health.

—Remove the irons when the ironing is done, and never let them stand on the stove where steam and grease will be sure to settle on them.

—The ashes of very old wood do not contain so much potash as ashes of wood of younger growth. Ashes generally pay well on all ordinary crops, but are specially adapted to the wants of fruit trees, grape vines and all kinds of vines, clover and peas.

—Farmers who used to swing the cradle and the scythe are but relics of a past age, and, if still observing, may see their successors in easy seats reaping and mowing, plowing and harrowing, riding over what in former days gave weary miles of tramping, muscular exertion transferred to the horses.

—Rice Snow Balls: Boil one pint of rice until soft in two quarts of water, with a teaspoonful of salt; put in small cups and when perfectly cold place in a dish. Make a boiled custard of the yelks of three eggs, one pint of sweet milk and one teaspoonful of corn starch; flavor with lemon when cold. Pour over the rice balls half an hour before serving.

—One mistake made with selling fowls is in growing them to a large size before selling. The best weights are from three to four pounds each. The demand is greater for such weights, as many buyers have found the larger sizes more expensive. Commission merchants report that while there is, of course, a demand for choice, large fowls, yet the smaller ones sell more rapidly.

—Toasted cheese makes an agreeable change for supper. Slice thin, or grate some cheese; pour over it a cupful of milk and stew until soft, stirring often. When it is soft, add a beaten egg, stirring well. Let it boil a moment. Have ready some small pieces of bread, nicely toasted and buttered; pour the cheese over them and serve. An old-fashioned earthen pie plate is a convenient thing in which to cook the cheese.

—Salem Pudding: Three coffee cups of flour, one coffee cup each of milk and chopped raisins, two-thirds cup of butter, or one coffee cup of suet or chopped pork, two-thirds cup of molasses, one-half teaspoonful each of cloves and cinnamon, half a nutmeg, one teaspoonful of soda and if suet is used a little salt. Warm the molasses and dissolve soda in it, mix suet, flour and raisins, then put all the ingredients together. Boil or steam it four hours.—Household.

—Woman's work on the farm has its share of drudgery, but what work for woman or man is without its share of drudgery in some form? There is no need of it being all drudgery. If the road does wind up the hill all the way there are and ought to be pleasant resting places; farming has many advantages for woman as well as man. There is no life on earth so independent, so filled with pure, mutual interests and pure pleasure as life on the farm, if made for both women and men what it ought to be and what it might be.—Dairy World.

THE LOCO WEED PEST.

Evil Effects of the Plant Upon the Cattle of the Western Plains.

I send you a plant called loco in this country. Stockman say it is very injurious to cattle and horses, having something of the effect of opium on man. Will you please give it a fair examination and answer in your paper?

The downy-leaved plant you send is Astragalus mollissimus, and its common name in the West is "loco weed," although in some other localities it is known as "rattle weed," as the seed, when ripe, breaks loose and rattles in the dry pods. There are 150 North American species of astralagus, but they are far more numerous west of the Mississippi than east of it. Several years ago, when the stock-raising industry began to be developed on the Western plains, it was discovered that the animals feeding on the wild grasses and other plants early in spring were frequently attacked with vertigo, impaired vision, and loss of flesh and strength, the brain being so seriously affected that the animals became unmanageable. Horses would sometimes live for several months after an attack, while others would die in a few days. The cause of this malady has been widely attributed to the eating of the different species of astragalus; hence the name of "loco," meaning foolish or crazy. These loco weeds belong to the same botanical family as beans, peas and clovers, and it seems scarcely possible that they can contain any poisonous principles that would affect horses and cattle, as so often claimed by Western stockmen. Several very careful analyses of the loco weed have been made without discovering any poisonous properties. Still, it is not denied that the eating of these plants does sometimes cause the affections described. It may be that it is caused by the indigestibility of the leaves of the plant, which, becoming impacted in the stomach, prevents this and other internal organs from performing their natural functions. Until some thorough scientific veterinarian has an opportunity of practically investigating the loco weed and its effect on cattle on the plains, we fear very little will be known in regard to this malady so often referred to by our readers in the West.—*N. GRAND SACHEM YERGER.

How His Good Wife Took All Nonsense Out of Him.

Mrs. Yerger—"You have no idea how much trouble I have with my husband. I didn't think it was possible for him to get any sillier than he was already, but I was mistaken."

Mrs. Peterby—"What is he up to now?"

"He is always up to some new foolishness. He is just running the lodge business into the ground. I would like to know all that goes on in these lodge rooms."

"I would, too. Judge Peterby comes home every night at about one o'clock smelling of whisky and beer, and when I ask him what sort of a smell it is, he has the impudence to say that it is incense which they use in their mystic ceremonies."

"I've noticed the same smell about Colonel Yerger. He, too, said it was incense, and that the effect it had on me proved it was incense, because I became incensed as soon as I smelled it. We poor women never find out any lodge secrets, for even if a man is ever so talkative, when he comes home from the lodge he is not in a condition to talk. I don't know what Colonel Yerger has been doing to deserve it, but they have made him a Grand Sachem."

"What in the world is that?"

"I don't know. That's some new order he has joined. He already belongs to the Order of Veiled Nightcaps, and the Order of Idiotic Red Muffs, and three or four more secret gangs."

"How did you find out that he is a Grand Sachem? Does he talk in his sleep?"

"No. Day before yesterday was his birthday. Just as we were getting up from the supper table there came two knocks at the door, and a deep, grave-like voice said: 'Is the Grand Sachem in his wigwam?' Colonel Yerger opened the door, and there was Gus De Smith, Kosciusko Murphy, Mose Schaumberg, Gilhooly, Hostetter McGinnis, old Judge Pennpbunker and a lot more of those old reprobates. They came into the room in Indian file and said: 'Is our red sister well?' Just think of it!

"I'd have scalped them with a fire shovel," said Mrs. Peterby.

"Then Gilhooly struck an attitude and said: 'Most noble Grand Sachem, this is thy birthday, and thy red brethren, the noble red braves now present in this wigwam, in consequence of the high esteem they have for their noble brother, and his great services to the lodge, do hereby present thee, noble savage, with this gold-headed walking-cane. Lean on it, most worthy lord of the forest, on thy stroll in the direction of the happy hunting grounds behind the setting sun.'"

"Do you allow such proceedings in your house, Mrs. Yerger? Why, I would have scalded them—I would have exterminated them."

"I couldn't help it. Colonel Yerger was very much moved. He said it was the happiest moment of his life, but that his heart was too full for utterance, and turning to me he had the impudence to say, handing me a quarter: 'Here, noble squaw, take this string of wampum to the corner grocery, and bring some beer, that I may make merry with my red brethren of the forest. Be seated, braves.'"

"I would have mopped the floor with him."

"For a whole week, Mrs. Peterby, that wretched man talked dime novel talk to me, until I threatened to invite mother to come and stay with us. That took the nonsense out of the Grand Sachem."

"What silly fools these men are!"

"Well, ain't they?"—Texas Siftings.

SLAVERY IN CHINA.

A System Which Follows Its Victim Even Into Foreign Countries.

The question will naturally arise in many minds how the vast number of dependents in China are maintained and controlled in servitude. The answer is, that all people are taught obedience to the head of the family, whether that person is the real parent or whether he merely stands in loco parentis. The teachings of parents, of the schools, of the books of religion and of the government are all in favor of such obedience and submission. There can be no living in China outside of a family. To be a nobody's child is to be an outcast, and hunted like a wolf on the mountains. In order to live in a house, to travel on the highways or byways, to buy food or clothing, to get employment or shelter, a Government pass is absolutely necessary, and that is always based upon a family pass. All law, all the officials and all the people of a vast and densely populated country are joined against any fugitive from a family.

In addition to all these the terrors of religion and superstition are brought to bear to enforce obedience to the family law. It is implicitly believed that those who are disobedient in this world or outside the family association will be wanderers and outcasts through all the worlds to come. It is the terrors of this belief that make the victim of the Chinese family authority go uncomplainingly to the lingering but sure death of the guano islands of Peru; to the pestiferous rice and cane fields of Cuba, and it is these terrors of the future which make the unfortunate slave girls endure lives of shame and infamy in foreign countries, where by raising a hand they could be freed.—San Francisco Chronicle.

—A new delicacy of marine origin, and surpassing in the opinion of many foreign gourmands the finest oysters, is about to be introduced into this country. It is called the strongylocentrotus, and is swallowed a syllable at a time.—Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.

—The largest soap manufactory in Philadelphia, at which 1,100,000 pounds are boxed every week, was founded in 1853 by a thrifty German, who walked into the city that year with only $25 in his pockets.

—Verre givre, or hoar frost glass, is an article now made in Paris, so called from the pattern upon it, which resembles the feathery forms traced by frost on the inside of the windows in cold weather.

—Winemakers are experimenting with electricity. It is said that if an selectric current is sent through a barrel of wine the liquid loses its rawness, gains in bouquet, and in every way takes on the qualities that used to come only with years of age.

—The high price of gum arabic has led chemists to seek for a substitute for it, and two products—one from flax seed and the other from starch—have been evolved, which, it is believed, will take the place of the Arabian gum in all the preparations in which that article is now used.

—A third crystalline form of carbon has been discovered in meteoric iron from Western Australia. The mineral, which is to be called cliftonite, resembles the diamond in the shape of its crystals, but in color and other respects it is more like graphite.

—Copper-plated sheet steel is already taking an important place in various industries. The sheet is made of decarbonized steel. After being rolled to the proper thickness, it is electroplated with copper on both sides and tinned on one side, in which condition it is found to be a better article for many purposes than sold sheet copper.

—The new machine just invented for printing postal-cards prints them from the roll and turns them out in packages ready for delivery. It runs them off at the rate of 300 a minute, with paper-bands pasted around each twenty-five. It is said one man can look after two machines.

—It is stated that not less than ninety-nine per cent. of all the flower-seeds sold in this country are raised abroad, chiefly in Germany. In that country immense tracts of land are devoted to the growth of flowers for seed, and the business is carried on in the most careful and systematic manner.

—Soft soap, with half its weight in pearlash—one ounce of mixture in about one gallon of boiling water—is in every-day use in most engineers' shops in the drip-pans used for turning articles bright in wrought iron and steel. With this kind of treatment the work, though constantly moist, does not rust, and bright nuts are immersed in it for days till wanted and retain their polish.

—Between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, at a distance of about 250,000,000 miles from the sun, there revolve some 265 little bodies, whose diameters vary from eight to ten miles to 200. Whether they are, as Professor Young once described them, parts "of a planet spoiled in the making" or not, is unknown, and perhaps may never be solved. But certain it is that there are always numberless little celestial bodies of this character, whose revolutions around the sun are performed as unerringly as those of the larger planets. They are called planetoids, from two Greek words, which mean resembling a planet or wanderer.

What Congress Costs.

There are just 401 members of the House and of the Senate, and to wait upon them and run errands and hold open the doors as they pass in and out, and carry the cards of their callers and take care of the thousands of bills they put in they have employed about 400 people, who are paid the snug little sum of $684,000 for doing so. Every member has one employe, and for the service of the same there is paid an average of about $1,800 each. The snug little sum of $380,000 is required to pay the salaries of the Senators, and for the compensation of the members of the House $1,695,000 is to be provided, and this brings the salaries of our National lawmakers to a total of over $2,000,000 per year. It costs a little less than $150,000 per session to pay the mileage of the members, and the country pays $50,000 to purchase the stationery for members and officers of the House alone in any one session. The Treasury pays $52,000 for reporting the debates, whether Congress sits for one month or for twelve, as the official reporters, like most of the clerks, are paid by the year, though they seldom do more than twelve months' work in the twenty-four months that make up a Congressional term.—Washington Letter.

Railroads in the Far North.

The most notherly railway in the world will be one now being constructed in Sweden. It will run from Lulea, on the Gulf of Bothnia, through Sweedish Lapland to the White Sea. Within the last few weeks the road has been constructed to a point within the Arctic circle, and the first locomotive has crossed the imaginary line which is supposed to inclose the regions where the Frost King holds almost complete sway. The head of the Gulf of Bothnia, where the road commences, is itself within a short distance of the Arctic circle. The most northerly point reached by rail in Canada is on the Canadian Pacific railway, about the summit of the Rocky Mountains, being about half-way between latitudes fifty-one and fifty-two degrees. The terminus of the Manitoba Northwestern Railway reaches within a few miles of latitude fifty-one degrees. The southern point of the Swedish road will be in the neighborhood of latitude sixty-seven degrees, or about sixteen degrees north of the most northerly point reached in Canada by rail.—Winnipeg Commercial.

A Merciful Panther.

Down on the Blackwater in southeastern Saline, about the year 1830, a settler named Samuel Miller had built his cabin and was opening a small farm. He had two little daughters, Jennie and Susie, aged 7 and 6. One morning the mother of the little girls sent them on an errand to a neighbors, nearly two miles distant. The road was a mere pathway through the thick woods, but the children knew it very well. Hand in hand they toddled along, unheeding because unconscious of peril. But half a mile from home, on the upper arc of a large leaning tree, which bent directly over the path, they saw a large panther stretched out at full length, basking in the morning sun. They did not know rightly what it was.

"Oh, Susie," said Jednie, "there's a wolf!"

"Yes," said Susie, "and I 'spects it's the bad old fellow that catched my lamb and kills papa's pigs. Lets go right back home and tell papa, and he will come and shoot it wiv his gun."

But what if he runs away while we're gone," returned Jennie, "Tell you what we'll do, Susie, you stay here and watch it, and I'll run and tell papa! I can run faster, you know.

Little Susie readily assented to the arrangement, assuring her sister that if the "bad old wolf" should come down the tree she would "take a stick and punch his eyes out. Then gathering some acorn cups and a quantity of velvety moss she set about constructing a "play house"at the foot of the very tree on which crouched the panther, watching her curiously. Presently he arose and walked back and forth, along the level extent of the tree, as if impatient and meaning to descend. But Susie shook her little fist at him menacingly, and soon he lay down again with his head between his paws, lazily blinking his great yellow eyes, "as if," Susie said, "he was awful sleepy."

Away ran Jennie, fleet as a little fawn, and in due time she reached her father's cabin and hurriedly told her mother that there was a "big wolf" on a tree and that Susie had "staid to mind it." Mrs. Miller at once comprehended the harrowing truth, and called frantically for her husband, who was at work in his clearing near by. Mr. Miller came at once accompanied by a young man in his employ named George Plunkett. Realizing the imminent peril of his child, and dreading that perhaps already a horrible fate had befallen it. the pioneer did not speak a word, but in a few seconds he and young Plunkett, rifle in hand, were running swiftly to the scene. Nearing the locality, Miller said:

"If we are not too late, George, let me fire first."

Possibly the emotions of the father at this time may be imagined; certainly I cannot describe them. Faint hopes and sickening fears alternated in his breast as he sped fleetly on. It was hardly possible that the child was yet alive, but as the panther had not sprung at first there was a bare chance. Meanwhile, in the little cabin home the agonized mother had caught her remaining little one to her breast and was praying silently, but fervently.

But—O, the joy of it!—on coming within sight of the fateful tree Miller saw his child safe and unharmed. The little innocent was busy at her play, crooning sweetly the while. Doubtless He who stopped the mouth of the lion had preserved her.

High above the panther was on his perch. In two seconds Miller's rifle rang out, the panther came crashing to the ground, a bullet fairly in its brain, and little Susie sprang up and exclaimed, "Oh, papa, how you scared me!"

The panther measured five feet ten inches. Miller tanned its skin and when his daughters had grown to womanhood each of them had a cape made from it.

The Reward of Perseverence.

At one of the mills in the city of Boston a boy was wanted and a piece of paper was tacked on one of the posts, so that all the boys could see it as they passed by. The paper read: "Boy wanted. Call at the office tomorrow morning." At the time named there was a host of boys at the gate. All were admitted but the overseer was a little perplexed as to the best way of choosing from so many and said: "Now, boys, when I only want one of you how can I choose from so many?" After thinking a moment he invited them all into the back yard, and driving a nail into one of the large trees and taking a short stick, told them that the boy who could hit the nail with a stick a little distance from the tree should have the place. The boys all tried hard, and, after three trials, each failed to hit the nail. The boys were told to come again next morning, and this time when the gate was opened there was but one boy, who, after being admitted, picked up the stick, and throwing it at the nail, hit it every time. "How is this?" said the overseer. "What have you been doing?" And the boy, looking up with tears in his eyes, said: "You see, sir, I have a mother, and we are very poor. I have no father, sir, and I thought I would like to get the place and so help all I can, and after going home yesterday I drove a nail into the barn and have been trying ever since, and have come down this morning to try again." The boy was admitted to the place. Many years have passed since then, and this boy is now a prosperous and wealthy man, and at the mills he was the first to step forward with a gift of $500 to relieve the sufferers. His success came by perseverance.

Voodooism in Georgia.

A strange case of Voodooism was reported at Atlanta, Ga., Wednesday. In Sandersville about a month ago the wife of the Rev. Tom Thomas, one of the most religious colored men in the community, felt a peculiar pain in her limbs, which gradually enveloped the entire body. Instead of yielding to ordinary physic each dose administered seemed to augment her suffering, and finally it dawned upon Tom that his wife was bewitched, and he sought the aid of Gus Cheevers, a half-breed Indian, noted for his knowledge of occult sciences. The old doctor as soon as he approached told Tom that his wife had been poisoned with rattlesnake poison by a neighbor, and that had three days more delay been made she would have been dead. He could save her though, and for the sum of $18 undertook to antidote the poison. His medicine would, he said, at 12 o'clock on a certain day make her sick almost unto death, but after that she would get well. The poison under his treatment exuded from the pores of her skin in threadlike sprays of mucus. Finally the woman recovered, and is now at work hoeing cotton. Sunday last the old voodoo doctor went to Tom's to find out the poisoner. This he pretended to accomplish with a talismanic ball pendent from a string. The neighbors assembled, and the ball was held up in front of each as his name was called, until Boston May was reached when the ball flew toward him, and the man, though denying it, stood accused. Old man Jerry's well, on a lot adjoining Tom's, began boiling up last Monday, and whenever a bucket of water is drawn it begins to foam and run over a la seidlitz powder, until the bucket is empty. The wondrous little ball also lays this devilment to Boston, and the old doctor says the cause is a little bottle of poison placed in the bottom of the well.

Lincoln Thanked the Methodists.

The following is a copy of a letter from President Lincoln in his own handwriting, written in response to a resolution adopted by the West Virginia Methodist Episcopal Conference in 1864 in regard to the prosecution of the war. The letter is now in the posession of Rev. H. D. Stauffer, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church, at Caldwell, O.:

GENTLEMEN: In response to your address, allow me to attest the accuracy of its historical statements, indorse the sentiment it expresses, and thank you in the nation's name for the sure promises it gives. Nobly sustained as the Government has been by all the churches, I would utter nothing which might in the least appear invidious against any, yet without this church, not less devoted than the rest, is, by its greater numbers, the most important of all. It It is no fault in others that the Methodist church sends more soldiers to the field, more nurses to the hospitals and more prayers to heaven than any other.

God bless the Methodist church, bless all the churches, and blessed be God, who in this great trial giveth us the churches.

Gen. Crook and the Bear.

General Crook has of late years lost his interest in deer-hunting, says the Omaha Bee, but it is said of him that he will go a thousand miles for the chance of a shot at a bear, and when he goes he generally gets the bear. Once, several years ago, he was on a bear-hunt in the Big Horn country with two or three gentlemen. They had tracked the bear into a big tule or cat-tail swamp, and had just entered in pursuit when the tules parted and a monstrous bear appeared and charged for General Crook, who was nearest to him. One of the gentlemen, in describing the incident, said: "The animal was not more than twenty-five feet from Crook, who stood still without moving a muscle. The outline of his figure and face stood against the background of the sky as clear as a cameo. The bear came rushing with jaws opened wide, and in a moment more would have seized Crook. Just at the right instant his rifle was brought to his shoulder like a flash and a bullet sped straight into the bear's mouth and went crashing through his head. The bear fell forward dead, and Gen. Crook was spattered with his blood. It was the most signal instance of iron nerve in the time of danger I ever saw," said the eyewitness.

There is certainly some consideration due compositors. They are not overpaid and every piece of poor manuscript makes a difference. An article written so villainously as to take twice as long to set it up as it ought to take, just doubles the work or divides the earnings. If this is not stark robbery, it is a form of imposition which touches it very closely. Write plainly, and use paper freely.—Northwestern.

Order of Publication.

Maria Grove by her husband and next friend, William P. Grove, vs. Amanda Moore and John J. Moore, her husband.

No. 433 Equity. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County.

The object of this suit is to procure a decree for a sale of certain mortgaged premises in Garrett county, which were mortgaged by the defendant, Amanda Moore, to William P. Grove, of whom the complainant is the assignee.

The bill states that on the 31st day of March, 1883, William P. Grove sold to Amanda Moore, wife of John J. Moore, a tract of land situate, lying and being in Garrett county, Maryland, at and for the sum of four thousand dollars, and on the same day executed and delivered a deed of conveyance for said land to the said Amanda Moore.

The bill further states that the said Amanda Moore on the 31st day of March, 1883, executed and delivered to the said William P. Grove, a mortgage on said land to secure the payment, on or before the 1st day of April, 1888, the sum of three hundred dollars, and also to secure ten annual payments according to the tentor of ten single bills in said mortgage mentioned, the same being for the balance of the purchase money for said land.

The bill further states that the said Amanda Moore, jointly with her husband, the said John J. Moore, executed and delivered to the said William P. Grove their ten joint and several single bills; two of said single bills have been paid, and the other eight remain unpaid; that on the 18th day of February, 1885, the said William P. Grove, for value received, assigned said morigage, together with said notes to the said Maria Grove; that there appears a credit on one of said notes of two hundred and fifteen dollars, and there now remains of said purchase money, together with the interest thereon accrued unpaid and owing the sum of $2,988.83.

The bill further states that default has been made in the payment of said purchase money; that the said land was purchased by said Amanda Moore out of her separate estate and that the money paid on account of said purchase money was paid by the said Amanda Moore out of her separate estate.

The bill further states that the said Amanda Moore has been living separate and apart from her said husband, the said John J. Moore, and charges that the said John J. Moore never had an interest to any extent whatever in said property, and that he doth not reside in the State of Maryland.

The bill prays that said real estate may be sold for the payment of said morigage debt and interest accrued, for such other and general relief as the nature of the case may require, and for process against the defendants.

It is thereupon ordered, by the Circuit Court for Garrett county in Equity, this 4th day of June, 1888, that the complainant cause a copy of this order, together with the object and substance of the bill, to be inserted in some newspaper published in Garrett county once a week for four successive weeks, before the 9th day of July, 1888, giving notice to the said John J. Moore, and warning him to appear in this Court in person or by solicitor, on or before the 5th day of September next, to show cause, if any he has, why a decree shall not pass as prayed.

More Democratic Business Men Leaving Their Party.

This is going to be a campaign for, and by, American labor and capital. Its nature will produce its characteristics. Facts will be more telling than oratory. The newspapers and clubs and Tariff tracts will do the main work.

Incidentally, and most fortunately for all interests, the campaign will bring capital and labor into closer relations than have existed for a great many years. The American employer and his employes have a common fight to make. Their interests are equally at stake. They must stand or fall together.

We have already shown how our Democratic manufacturers are coming to the front and joining the [illegible] party. It is interesting to observe how these men talk about the new political situation that has been created through the ambition of Mr. Cleveland to be re-elected on an issue of his own making, after he had secured a re-nomination by the shameless violation of his Reform pledges and by putting the entire Federal power and patronage into the contest.

To-day we publish interviews with representative business men of this city, who have been forced to leave the Democratic ranks and to stand up for the American system of Protection. One of these disgusted Democrats is Mr. Alexander Agar, who is at the head of a large stationery and paper business at No. 110 William street. He says he has been voting the Democratic ticket for nearly thirty years, but is "going to stop." The reason why is clear and cogent. "I worked in 1847," says he "for $3 per week. Under the protective system that followed I was able to increase my wages and to become an employer myself in my line of business. I am not in favor of any proposition that will reduce us to the $3 system again, which by the way prevailed under free trade, and which ceased to prevail when a protective tariff went into effect."

Mr. Agar, like tens of thousands of other Democratic business men, sees through the shams and false pretenses of the Mills bill. It is primarily in the interest of Free Trade and not of reducing the surplus. "Under a high Tariff in 1883," says Mr. Agar, "the receipts from imported paper were $19,406.87. In 1887, after the Tariff had been reduced 10 per cent., the receipts were swelled to $212,216. That meant that under the free trade system $222,000 worth of paper had come into this country from Norway and elsewhere in excess of what had come in under the high Tariff. In Norway they pay women in the paper mills fifteen cents a day and men twenty-five. Here we pay the women $1 a day and the men $1.50. Under free trade we would have to compete with Norway labor. I don't propose to do it."

The testimony of another witness, Mr. Frederick J. Smith, a young man whose abilities have made him foreman of the large lithographing establishment of Richardson & Foos, at Fourth avenue and Twelfth street, is out with the Democratic party because it is out for Free Trade. He says—and he ought to know—that "it is foolish to say that workingmen have not watched the Tariff debates. They have. They are the interested parties. I have watched them carefully and I am against the Mills bill and what Gov. Hill calls its policy of 'freer trade' That's all there is about it. I am against Free Trade on general and particular principles and the Democratic party will find a good many thousands of us in the same position a few months from now."

Comments would be superfluous and needless. The uprising of intelligent American workingmen in behalf of protected labor has begun in thousands of localities and it will astonish the English observers of the great struggle as thoroughly as the uprising of the loyal men of the North astonished and appalled them in 1861.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

The English newspapers are heaping so much praise upon the Democratic party that they may defeat their own purposes. There are people this side of the water who are none too pleasantly disposed toward England, and without any desire to secure her gratification.

"This summer ladies are going to dress their hair as they did three hundred years ago," says an exchange. This makes some of the ladies pretty old.

Five Reasons.

The New York Tribune gives the following five excellent reasons why a man should be a Republican:

1. Because there is everything in the record of the Republican party of which he may be proud, and nothing of which he will need to be ashamed. It saved the Union, emancipated the slaves, restored specie payments and reduced the National debt one half. Unlike the Democratic party, it has never been in alliance with slave owners and the rum power; it never pronounced the war for the Union a failure and sued for a craven peace; and it has never allayed itself against the principles of honest finance and National honor.

2. Because Republicanism does not stand for the suppression of a single Democratic vote in any state of the Union. In every Republican State Democrats are free to vote as they please, and their ballots are counted as they are cast. Democracy stands for the suppression of Republican votes by intimidation, crime and fraud in every State formerly in rebellion.

3. Because the Republican party in its tariff legislation laid the foundations of a national prosperity unexampled in modern times, and defends the cause of American industry today against the combined attack of English manufacturers and the free-trade Democracy. The Solid South in the Confederate Constitution pronounced for free-trade precisely as the party of Buchanan, Breckenridge and Douglas had done before the war, and as the party of Tilden, Hancock and Cleveland has done since. Republicanism is the cause of industrial independence.

4. Because the Republican party is American in its sympathies and its policy, believes in governing and developing America for the benefit of Americans, and would neither order its tariff policy for the accommodation and profit of foreigners, nor lower the country in the estimation of the world by surrendering American rights or compromising American honor through pusilanimous diplomacy. The Democratic party is equally un-American in its foreign and its domestic policy.

5. Because the Republican party is recruited from the more intelligent and progressive elements of American population, and is the organization in which all friends of Civil Service Reform, practical temperance legislation, or of any other movement in the direction of good government naturally belong. The Democratic party is not hospitable to any real reform in government, as the Civil Service Reformers have learned to their shame.

The following Democrats, well known in their respective localities in Pennsylvania, have announced their intention to sustain Harrison and the cause of protection in this campaign:

Gen. A. L. Pearson, of Allegheny county.

Hon. Orange Noble, of Erie, once a Democratic candidate for state treasurer.

Judge Handly, of Lackawanna, a life-long Democrat.

Ex-Mayor Forwood, of Chester, Delaware county.

Hon. John Slingluff, of Montgomery county, president of the National Bank of Norristown, and former candidate for Congress.

Frank Heath, of Erie county, former candidate for the legislature.

J. W. Gephart, a leading lawyer of Bellefonte.

Frederick Stanford, of Corry, ex-Mayor of that city and a former candidate for the state senate.

H. C. Trexler, of Lehigh county, formerly president of the Allentown common council.

Charles F. McKenna, of Allegheny, formerly candidate for congress.

R. K. Martin, of Fayette county, late member of the Democratic central committee.

John W. Hindemarch, of Washington county, a leading Democrat of that county.

George H. Myers, of Northampton county, former Burgess of Bethlehem.

This is only a partial list of the large number of Democrats in Pennsylvania, of local reputation and influence, who have within the past two weeks been announcing themselves at Harrison men because they cannot stand the free trade doctrines of the President; and each one of them means either scores or hundreds of followers.

Harrison's Kind Heart.

General Harrison is, of course, a member of the Grand Army of the Republic and of the Loyal Legion.

There are hundreds of old soldiers in Indianapolis and scattered through the State who fought in his brigade and who remember well his bravery, his care for his men and his unselfish patriotism. If one meets a one-armed veteran in the street here the simplest questions will call out a eulogy of Harrison. The old soldiers remember him vividly for his tenacious care for their rights. When he was a colonel he saw to it that his regiment received all the allowances of every kind to which it was entitled, and when he led a brigade every soldier felt that he had a friend in his commander, strict disciplinarian though he was.

An old soldier whom I met quite by accident in a hotel here told me this anecdote: "In the battle of Peach Tree Creek, one of the fights before Atlanta, the surgeon of Harrison's brigade was lost. No one knew where he was, but he had disappeared. My recollection is that in the rapidly changing movements the surgeon and his assistants had become tangled with another brigade, and were so overwhelmed with duty that they couldn't get back to their own command. However that may be, when the fight was over our field hospital was full of wounded, and there was no one to attend them.

"The general threw off his coat, tore his own tent into strips, and went about bandaging wounds. He even tore his shirt off his back and used it up in bandaging the boy's wounds. When surgical help arrived I remember what a sight the general was. Both his arms were bare, and they were covered with blood from shoulders to finger tips.

"The men most fond of the general are the men who know him best." That is the pithy sentence in which one of his oldest friends here sums up his opinion of General Harrison's personal character, — Philadelphia Press.

They Won't Bet.

Cleveland Leader.

The betting offers on Cleveland seem to have been all wind. A few New York Republicans made up a purse of $10,000, and sent a man around to find the fellows who wanted to bet two to one on Cleveland. They were non est. The individuals who were said to be ready to put up their money could not be found. A New York dispatch, speaking on the subject says:

"H. M. Cooper, of Arkansas, who was here in attendance on the Republican National Committee meeting, said to-day: 'I have tried for a week to get some of that two-for-one money on Cleveland. The nearest I got to it was a fellow in the Hoffman House, who wanted to put up $50 forfeit on a bet of $1,000, to $500. My reply was that I was ready to 'put up or shut up,' and that I knew all about the forfeit scheme. Naturally in trying to get bets, I ran in among a number of old sporting men. One of the wiliest and shrewdest betting men in the lot said to me: 'A man would be a fool to lay odds seriously on Cleveland. The situation scarcely warrants even betting. The Republicans have played their cards so that they have only one state to carry, with New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, North Carolina, Florida, Virginia, West Virginia and Tennessee to make it from. Cleveland must carry every one of these, while Harrison needs only one.'"

The Democratic candidate for Vice President is celebrated chiefly for carrying a bandanna handkerchief. The reason he carried a red one was that he was a slave to the filthy—and, thank God, now antiquated—snuff habit, and a white one was soon soiled — the dark one kept down laundry bills, and did not show its uncleanliness either. The real use of Thurman's red handkerchief then, was as a snuff rag. The wearing of the bandana now is simply a reminder that one of the National Democratic candsdates was so weak minded that, along with so many other old grand-mothers of the land he did not have the manly will power to break away from a habit so filthy and disgusting to all refined people. Will Democracy advocate, along with the bandana, the compulsory use of snuff? There is no use for the bandana, you know, without the snuff. This would be about as reasonable as some other issues Democracy has been and is advocating.—Moundsville Herald.

OLD SAWS IN RHYME.

If you don't like it, lump it; don't blow your own horn;
Too big for his buttons; acknowledge the corn.

Standing water's unwholesome — a standing debt, too;
And only give honor where honor is due.

As clay in the potter's hands; might maketh right;
Do not be the tail to another one's kite.

The sweet bread of idleness mostly is crust;
He eats humble pie; he takes nobody's dust.

A jewel is consistency; all fiddle faddle;
Strike the dog in the manger; your own canoe paddle.

Nursing trouble don't mend it; speak not than speak ill;
The still pig's the one which gets most of the swill.

Upon its own bottom each tub ought to stand;
Christmas cometh but once in a year; hand in hand.

The children of old maids and bachelor's wives
Are perfect; shank's mare; but the fittest survives.

In your pipe put and smoke it; sly boots; no great shakes.

Some old two-and-sixpence; too good to be true;
Never trust in another your duties to do.

Competition's the life of trade; sharp as a tack;
As dead as a door nail; a hard nut to crack.

Lookers on more than players see; slick as a whistle;
Heavy as lead; just as light as a thistle.

A ragged cap often may crown golden brains;
What one person loses another one gains;

A pot many own is ill stirred and worse boiled;
By one rotten apple a barrel-full's spoiled.

Domestic infelicity is a thorn in the flesh;
Happy go lucky; whipped cur dreads the lash.

If a woman drowns hunt her up stream; splitting hairs;
The wits are wool-gathering; putting on airs.

All moonshine; blue Monday; some pumpkins; high jinks;
A chain's only strong as its weakest of links.

As cool as a cucumber; thicker than mud;
As long as a piece of string; nipped in the bud.

The sweetest of joys from us always are flying.

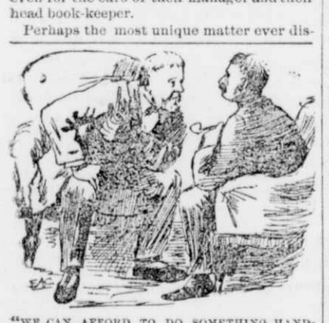
ARTHUR MAY.



How He Became Spriggs & Co.'s Chaplain—Not a Love Story.

[Written for This Paper.]

Spriggs and Company, proprietors and operators of sundry coal mines, furnaces and rolling mills in Western Pennsylvania, sat in the "snuggery" at the rear of Spriggs and Company's office.

John Spriggs, who is "Spriggs," and Peter Spriggs, who is "the Company," invented the snuggery with an eye to other inventions in connection with their enormous business. In the snuggery no books, no desks, no any thing were to be found, save and except a pair of immense armchairs, two pipes and a huge earthenware jar of smoking tobacco. In the snuggery Spriggs and Company held their cabinet councils, when they planned and sifted matters which they considered too exclusive even for the ears of their manager and their head book-keeper.

Perhaps the most unique matter ever discussed and cordially settled by two wealthy business men was under Spriggs and Company's consideration in their snuggery some few years ago.

"WE CAN AFFORD TO DO SOMETHING HANDSOME."

"He's saved us a clear hundred thousand in buildings and machinery, Pete, to say nothing about loss of orders," said Spriggs to the Company.

"Not a cent less, John," responded the Company.

"We can afford to do something handsome," continued Spriggs.

"We can," echoed the Company.

Silence ensued for a few moments save only for the steady puffing of Spriggs and Company on the brace of capacious pipes. Down came Spriggs' hand upon his broad knee, and he bent forward as he exclaimed with considerable emphasis, "I have it!"

"Have what!" queried the Company.

"I have a good idea by which, if carried out, we can help the parson and do ourselves and the boys no harm. We'll build a church—a church that shall be a credit to the Lord and to Spriggs and Company. There's a good lot near the old mill, and we might build a parsonage as well without crowding either the church or the mill. Then we might set aside a percentage of the profits each year to help run that church. I tell you, Pete, this young May has grit, and knows how to handle our men better than we do ourselves. So we'll appoint him chaplain in charge of Spriggs and Company's church. What do you say?"

"I cordially agree with you, John. We owe young May more than ordinary recognition; besides which, I feel sure that a church, with such a parson, in connection with our works, will be a better thing for all of us than we can properly appreciate at present."

After which prophetic remark, Spriggs and Company adjourned to consult with their bookkeeper in regard to ways and means.

* * * * *

Such a convention, tending to such a very practically and worthy conclusion, requires some explanation; and therein lies our story.

* * * * *

Arthur May was, by all his acquaintances and many of his friends, considered a crank; as a matter of fact he merely had some very decided notions and opinions of his own. For example: Upon coming of age he relinquished a fairly large fortune—bestowing it upon sundry charities and scientific institutions—merely retaining sufficient to supply his absolute needs from time to time. People said his ideas were wild, visionary and utopian—some even asserting that Arthur May was a socialist, nihilist and anarchist combined. When he announced his intention of studying for the ministry his friends said he was crazy, as no May had ever been known to bind himself to any creed or canon. That was true enough, and Arthur was May enough to refuse to trot in the traces of orthodoxy. He entered no theological seminary and subscribed to no confession of faith. He studied his New Testament with his own common sense for commentary and concordance. He thought that the love of God and love for his neighbor made a strong combination for a preacher, without the aid of 'ologies and 'isms. When he was twenty-five years old he left his mother's home determined to find a field of labor—and he found it. Found it in the dirt-begrimed region of Ironvale, where a thousand men with dependent families earned their bread by the sweat of their brows—men who worked like horses six days each week and loafed away their Sundays—men who said so much that was black and dirty and unpleasant that most of them came very near forgetting that they were men. And that, by the way, was one thing which Arthur May never proposed to overlook. He had started out to do his life-work as a preacher and teacher, but he never intended to forget that he was also a man.

THEN DASHING THROUGH THE SMOKE AND FLAME.

Arthur May made his first public bow to the Ironvale population under rather favorable, if risky, circumstances. While in Johnstown he had heard of the place, and sauntered over (a matter of a ten-mile walk) one day in the fall. The more of dirt, squalor, misery and degradation he beheld in the streets and homes, the more he became convinced that it was the very place for practical Christian work—a place where a few simple sanitary and hygienic lessons would be more to the point than hypothetical discussions on such questions as conditional immortality and the personality of the devil. So he decided to stay, and established his headquarters at the none too sweet and clean hostelry dignified by the name of the Ironworkers' Exchange.

Opposite to the hotel was a three-story frame building, apparently rented out in flats. On the first night of his advent to Ironvale, Arthur May was about to retire when he noticed smoke entering his own half-open window. He peered out into the night and beheld a small flame slowly spreading itself over the front of the dingy tenement house across the street. Without waiting to don his coat and vest, he hastily ran down stairs and gave the alarm. All the inmates of the tenement were soon in the street, but as there was not even the pretence of a fire department in Ironvale, the meager furniture of the house was doomed and the building itself was soon enwrapped in flames. Suddenly a small, slender figure in a white night-dress appeared at a window on the top-story. It was apparently a little girl of seven or eight years, and, although not a word that she said could be heard in the crowd, it was easy to see that she was greatly terrified and crying for help.

"Great God!" said a woman, "it's Tim Doolan's little Em! She's all alone, poor young'un—her mother dead three week's ago, an' Jim, the night watchman, over to the sheet iron mill!"

Other women in the crowd screamed and wrung their hands; some of the men bemoaned the lack of a hook and ladder, while others, with hands in pockets and gaping mouths, watched with lazy unconcern or idle curiosity the fate of the helpless child.

But while the crowd talked, cried and gaped, Arthur May hastily endeavored to comprehend the plan of the burning house and its stairways. Then, heedless of the scorching heat, the blinding and suffocating smoke, and deaf to the warning cries of the men, he rushed into the ill-fated building. With great difficulty he found the child and wrapped her in an old shawl which he saw lying in the room. Then, dashing again through the smoke and flames, he emerged once more on to the street, where he was greeted with a loud hurrah and almost deafening hand-clapping. Arthur gave up the motherless girl to some of the women and quietly returned to his lodgings. But several of the Ironvale people followed him, and in the office of the hotel—his sleeves rolled up, his hair and mustache singed, and his face, hands and arms blackened by the smoke—Arthur May held quite a reception, in the course of which he took occasion to introduce himself and explain his object in coming to Ironvale. When he said he was a preacher and wanted the men to come and hear him talk to them next Sunday, they all promised to be on hand, for they thought a man who wasn't afraid to risk his life, as Arthur had done, was worthy a hearing, whatever he might have to say. One thing was assured—Arthur's popularity with the women folk; and that was a great thing in Ironvale, as indeed it is in any community.

Another method was necessary in Ironvale to secure the lasting regard and esteem of the men, and the opportunity to bid for the respect of the Ironvale masculine population came in Arthur's way on the first Sunday in the smoky town.

There was no church in Ironvale; there was not even a hall, so on Sunday afternoon Arthur took up a position just outside of the big mills belonging to Spriggs and Company. Somehow or other he had managed to make it pretty well known that he was going to preach, and quite a crowd assembled to hear the young fellow who had so gallantly rescued "Jim Doolan's little Em."

Arthur was a fascinating speaker, and being a good judge of human nature and possessed of his full share of common sense, he made himself more than interesting to these rough men, who gave him a respectful hearing. There was one man in the crowd, however, who objected to the preaching. This was Jerry Burke, a big loafing bully, who worked very little and drank a great deal. He was a chronic grumbler and especially objected, on general principles, to any thing like an innovation likely to better the moral condition of things in Ironvale. This same Burke was a sharp thorn in the side of Spriggs and Company, who only tolerated the fellow about their works, fearful of possible mischief which he might perpetrate should they discharge him. Physically, Burke was a powerful fellow, standing six feet high and tipping the scale at two hundred pounds. He was never satisfied with either the wages or the hours of work, though as a matter of fact he had small cause for being discontented. In short, he was a bully, a sneak, and unconscionably lazy. Still, among the Ironvale men he had some sort of a following: the weak-minded and more ignorant workmen looked upon Burke as the champion of their rights, and an additional reason for their tolerance of Jerry as a sort of unacknowledged leader, was the fact that they knew he could "lick" any one of them.

Now about the time that Arthur May came to Ironvale, Burke, with some other restless spirits in a neighboring iron center, was secretly arranging plans for a strike among Spriggs and Company's employes. Of course, so far as Jerry Burke was concerned, he cared nothing about bettering the condition of the "boys;" he was looking to his own aggrandizement as a "labor leader," and to the easy acquisition of money by means of assessments which would be levied on the boys to further the strike.

Now Burke had a fairly good idea that a sensible young fellow like Arthur May would not naturally assist him in his schemes, so he resolved to inform the preacher that he must "git." Arthur had almost finished his "talk," when Burke, who was in the crowd, rudely interrupted.

"Most through, parson?"

"Yes," said Arthur. "Are you tired?"

"O, you can finish your say this time, but you can't talk here any more. Preachin's all right, mebbe, but we don't want it here. Savey?"

"Well, my friend, no one else seems to object, and if you don't like it just stay away. Still, I would rather have you come and listen. I may as well announce now, my friends, that I shall be here next Sunday afternoon. Perhaps before the cold weather comes we can get a hall or church built."

"We don't want no hall, nor church, nor no parson," said Burke, "and if you shoot off in this part of the country again, you'll be sorry, that's all I have to say."

"If I do, what then?" inquired Arthur.

"Only this; I shall knock a few of your teeth down your throat to sorter choke you off!"

All this time none of the couple of hundred men assembled uttered a word, though once or twice the women cried "Shame on ye, Jerry!" or "Give the parson a show!"

Arthur sized up the situation in a moment. He saw at once that his would be persecutor was a bully, so often found in communities of ignorant men, and understood that Burke must be summarily disposed of if he hoped to stay and do any good in Ironvale. Now if there was one thing Arthur May had been proficient in at college it was boxing and wrestling. Still, he was not a powerful man, and weighed less by fifty pounds than Jerry Burke. So the resolution at which he arrived was a risky one.

"Boys," said Arthur, "this man says he will lick me if I stay in Ironvale. Now, I am going to stay and he may as well lick me now as later on. I don't much believe in fighting—never saw any fun in it especially it looks bad on a Sunday and in a preacher. Sometimes, however, it is necessary. It is necessary now, I think, and I guess you boys will stand off and see that a stranger gets fair play!"

Off came Arthur's coat, and stepping down from his impromptu platform of rough stone he walked briskly over to Burke, who was at that moment the most completely surprised man in Ironvale.

"I'll take that licking now, Mr. Jelly!"

Burke had no coat to throw off, as he was already standing in his shirtsleeves, but he replied by giving Arthur a back-handed slap in the face.

Well, some of the Ironvale men tell, to this day, how it was the "prettiest" thing they ever saw—"the way that the parson knocked out Jerry Burke," who in ten minutes from the time he first interrupted Arthur, had as much as he could do to sneak off like a whipped cur.

ARTHUR ADDRESSING THE CROWD.

From that time on, with the exception of half a dozen malcontents like Burke, every man, woman and child in Ironvale was Arthur May's warm admirer. As for Jerry Burke, he found it vastly more pleasant to reside in a neighboring town.

* * * *

Yet, although Mr. Burke removed from Ironvale, he by no means relinquished his various schemes for bringing about a strike at Spriggs and Company's. But, in view of the fact that thousands of men in adjoining districts were idle, Burke and his coadjutors did not find many of the men very enthusiastic about striking; and when Spriggs and Company, getting wind of the efforts of the Burke gang, voluntarily raised the wages ten per cent., the professional growlers felt that they might as well withdraw from Ironvale. Burke was the angriest and most disappointed man in Western Pennsylvania; all his chronic ill will and bad blood was focused in a determination to wreak vengence, first on Spriggs and Company, and then on the "poor fools" who could be satisfied with a "paltry ten per cent. sop."

Somehow or other Arthur May got to know that Jerry Burke occasionally found his way to Ironvale, and certain sly and underhanded actions of the fellow's made Arthur suspect that Burke's motive in visiting his old haunts were other than ordinary, so he resolved to watch him closely.

One night, about two months after Arthur May's first appearance in Ironvale, the parson (as every one called Arthur, and as he rather liked to be called) was making his way to his humble lodgings. As he passed Spriggs and Company's engine house—the only building belonging to the firm which could lay any claim to substantiality or architectural beauty—he noticed a man steal up to one of the windows, which he opened and entered. He noticed that the man carried a small package. A minute later the man emerged from the same window, minus the package, and Arthur then saw that it was Jerry Burke.

Now Arthur, for prudential reasons, carried a small revolver, and this Mr. Burke suddenly found within about two yards of his eyes.

"Burke, you are up to no good!"

"What's that to you!"

"Now, my lad, you know you can't bluff me. You ought to know I am not afraid of you at even odds. With this weapon I absolutely command you to explain your presence here."

"I don't have to. Pity a man can't move about without telling his business to a d——d preacher!"

"Now, Burke, I mean what I say. But as you refuse to tell me any thing, I must find out why you were in the engine house. You will lead the way through the door, not through the window. You know me. If you disobey me I shall feel compelled to shoot. Go on!"

Slowly and sullenly Burke led the way. The door was open, and just inside sat an old man who did duty as watchman. "Ah, Walker," said Arthur, "bring your lamp, will you?"

The old watchman was surprised, but asked no question as he complied with Arthur's request. The building was large, built of red brick and stone. It was divided into two portions, one covering the six immense boilers and the other the two powerful engines.

The window which Burke had entered was on the side farthest from the doorway and just behind one of the engines.

All was quiet at this hour, work being slack, and consequently no night shift being run.

"Look around a little, Walker," said May, as with pistol in hand, he closely watched Burke.

But Walker discovered nothing unusual.

"Ain't you glad!" asked Burke, sneeringly.

"Why were you here, Burke?" inquired Arthur, very sternly.

"Because it suited me," was the rough reply. Arthur wondered what he should do next. He still kept Burke well covered, but his thoughts were very busy. For a minute or two all was as still as death—so still that Arthur could detect what sounded like the muffled ticking of a clock.

"Is there a clock in this building, Walker?" queried Arthur.

"Yes, sir. But it stopped this two weeks and more."

Arthur noticed a queer expression pass over Burke's features, and an inspiration seized the parson.

"Burke, that ticking is of some infernal machine which you have brought here—I know it. I have both read of and seen such things."

"Yes, curse you, and if you don't hurry out of here we shall all be to hell in a few minutes."

"Scoundrel!"

Arthur still watched his man, and still thought. He thought of the costly engines which if destroyed would throw out of employment a thousand men for several weeks. He thought of a possible terrific explosion and the loss of life, probably, in the cottage which stood only a stone's throw away; he thought of his own life, and of old Walker, and even of Burke himself.

"Burke, you are not a man. You are a devil. If you will pick up that package and carry it down to the creek you shall have that chance of your life; if you refuse I shall shoot you in a moment—shall kill you."

The fellow began to whine like a baby and said it was almost time for the horrible machine to do its work. Said it was only set for fifteen minutes. Coward that he was.

Burke begged for his own life, caring nothing for the lives or property of others.

"At once, fellow, at once—pick up that devilry and take it to the creek. When it is in the water I will see that you have a chance to escape—and then, never show your face near Ironvale again!"

Seeing Arthur in earnest, Burke tardily took the ticking package from the machinery of the engine and made his way out of the building, followed at a short distance by Arthur—who was himself running a great risk.

Once outside, the villain walked briskly toward the creek, which lay some three hundred yards distant. He soon reached the banks and hurled the package, which was evidently heavy, into mid-stream. But one thing both he and Arthur had forgotten, or had been ignorant of. There was thick ice on the water and as the package struck with considerable force there was a tremendous explosion which shattered the ice and splashed the water in all directions.

Arthur was fifty yards or more from the creek, but was thrown down by the shock and severely stunned. As for Burke, a dozen large pieces of ice struck him—dealing him a fearful death.

It isn't necessary to go into any more particulars—but that's how Arthur May came to be Spriggs and Company's chaplain.

BEES VERSUS INDIANS.

A Touching Story Told by a Veracious California Pioneer.

Many readers are familiar with Wall's extraordinary feat, in 1849, in driving, according to his statement, a swarm of bees across the plains. A day or two since, as one of our business men was coming down town, he happened to discover a large bee quietly resting on Wall's shoulder, as preparations were being made for sprinkling the court-house lawn. "Say, Wall, what are you doing with that bee on your shoulder?" Wall was startled for a moment, but, recovering his usual composure, spoke with gravity, carrying conviction of untarnishable truth. "I'll tell you, and it's the solemn truth, if ever I spoke it in my life. That bee is the queen of the swarm I drove across the plains. She has been hunting me for years, and knew me the moment I called her name. You see, she is getting a little gray, but I knew her on sight. She piloted the swarm, and I used to feed her from my own molasses can. That bee is the last of her race, and I shall take care of her in her old age. I tell you, John, that bee brings up many reminiscences of that memorable trip. Several times that swarm stood by me in an hour of peril. They could scent an Indian several miles away, and they got to really enjoy an Indian attack. The fact is they understood tactics as well as the best-trained soldiers. When the queen sounded an alarm, every bee was under arms ready for fight. First a skirmish line was thrown out, and you could see more or less uneasiness among the red-skins as one and another would claw at his ears, eyes or nose, but when the order to 'charge' was sounded, and the bee battalions began to move in 'double quick,' a route and stampede always followed. It is a fact, John, if ever I told the truth in my life. What I am saying is true. Those bees fought all my battles across the plains, and this is my old 'queen.'"—Napa (Cal.) Register.

—"I never should think of allowing you to buy me ice-cream, dear George for I know ice-cream is often poisonous," said the young lady, tenderly, and George's heart grew glad until she continued: "but I really don't believe that we should run any risk if we went in and tried a little sherbet, do you?"—Journal of Education.

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.

—It is said that some clothespin box packers can pack 72,000 a day. They are paid one cent for packing a box of four gross. At this rate they make five dollars a day.

—Iron is a constituent of most solids and is found in food crops. Oats, barley and rice contain much more iron than wheat, corn or beans. Nearly four per cent of the ash of the oat grain is iron.

—Prof. Poel, of St. Petersburg, has found fifty per cent. of petroleum in the cod liver oil sold by one druggist, the adulterated article having the taste, smell and appearance of the genuine. Mineral oil is also frequently found in olive oil.

—A very dense graphitic carbon for incandescent electric lighting is now produced by passing the electric discharges from an induction coil between two electrodes inclosed in a vessel containing illuminating gas; the graphite forms at the negative electrode, and gradually elongates toward the positive pole.

—A new process for preparing beans for food has been devised. The beans are reduced to flour, which is boiled until it attains a certain consistency, and the name of "curd" is given to it. The article is simple, cheap and very nutritious, and is much relished by the Chinese. It has a large percentage of caseine, and is a good substitute for milk.

—Many experiments in burning brick with oil in place of wood are being made by manufacturers of brick along the Hudson river. If the new method proves to be practical it is estimated that there will be a saving of forty per cent. effected. The main difficulty is in the "drying off" process. One result of using oil instead of wood will be the preservation of thousands of acres of forests in the counties affected.

—Both in China and Japan soapstone has long been largely used for protecting structures built of soft stone and other materials specially liable to atmosphere influences. It has been found that powdered soapstone in the form of paint has preserved obelisks formed of stone for hundreds of years, which would, unprotected, have long ago crumbled away. For the inside painting of steel and iron ships it is found to be excellent. It has no anti-fouling quality, but is anti-corrosive.

—At a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences, in Paris, M. Chevreul communicated, in the name of M. Arnaud, Curator at the Museum of Natural History, a very interesting note on the toxic substance which the Comalis employ to poison their arrows. This substance is the "Ouabajo" wood, and from this wood M. Arnaud has extracted a crystalline matter endowed with terrible venomous properties. In subcutaneous and intravenous injections three one-hundredths of a grain of the poison suffices to kill a dog. Death rapidly occurs by an arrest of the heart's action.

—M. Perrotin, a French astronomer, has discovered that the planet Mars, besides being inhabited, has a number of gigantic canals connecting her seas and, what is more remarkable, that some of the canals are still in course of construction. The theory of immense canals in Mars—from eighteen hundred to two thousand miles in length and from twenty to fifty miles in width—has already been put forward, but positive knowledge on the subject has been lacking. If these canals be the work of artifice on the part of the inhabitants of the planet, as M. Perrotin states, then it will be reasonable to believe that it is peopled with enormous giants.

ODD HEAD-DRESSES.

Singular Coiffures Worn by Natives of Asia and Africa.

The Ethiopians have no hair, properly speaking, but what answers them for hair is really different from the hair of the white races. If a hair from the head of a Caucasian be examined through a microscope, it is found to be hollow, composed of sections or joints somewhat resembling those of a cane, or in some cases like a ladder with its rounds. The hair of an African is entirely different in this respect, being solid and round, this constituting the difference between wool and hair; but nevertheless the fact that his wool is solid appears only to endear it to the African, who gives it all the more attention, perhaps because he has so little of it, and divides his scalp into patches, gathering up the hair from each into a circular knot and tying it with a string as carefully as though it were a treasure. In the interior of the dark continent the wool of the negroes is frequently long, though never straight, but so difficult is the task of disentangling their locks that not much attempt at ornateness is made in the African head-dresses. Livingston says that when an African chief makes his toilet, the most he ever attempts in the way of arranging a head-dress is to comb his wool up into a pyramidal shape, stick a few feathers in it, and hang one or more strings of beans along the facade, so to speak, of this unique edifice.

The Asiatics have always been famous for decorating their heads. The Mohammedans of old shaved their heads, except a single knot of hair at the exact top of the head, which was left for a practical purpose; the Mohammedan doctrine being that, at the resurrection of the dead, the angel Gabriel was specially detailed to attend to the Mohammedans, and he raised them by the topknot; accordingly the topknot was left full and strong, in order that the hold might not break, a hole being left in the top of the coffin in order to facilitate the angel's work.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Destruction of Forests.

General James L. Brisbane has just published a book on "Trees and Tree Planting." He gives an interesting account of the variety of trees to be found in the virgin forests of the United States and the ranges of soil in which they will flourish best. But what is of most importance are the facts he furnishes of the annual destruction of our forest trees. Coming eastward, after a four years' tour of army service on the treeless plains of the West, the contrasts of forest growth and the rapid disappearance of densely-wooded tracts during his sojourn on the frontier induced him to gather statistics on the subject and print them as a warning of the consequences that must speedily ensue. Computing the enormous quantity of timber cut for building purposes, for railroad ties and for the fencing in of farms, the statistics that he gives shows that "every year we strip 8,000,000 acres of trees and plant less than 1,000,000 acres to replace them. The end," he says, "is so plain even a fool may read it as he runs." And the work goes on. The greater part of the Northern pine is gone, and the hemlock is fast disappearing. Resort is now had to the Southern pine forests, heretofore scarcely touched by the woodman's axe, and the hardwood forests of the North Carolina mountains. This incessant slaughter is not only changing our climate, but is drying up the sources of our navigable rivers.—Baltimore Sun.

SABBATH-DAY READING.

HELP FROM THE LORD.

Psalm cxxi.

Up to the hills I lift mine eyes,
Oh, whence shall come mine aid?
My help doth from the Lord arise,
The Lord who built the earth and skies
And all their host hath made.

He will not let thy footsteps slide,
But watchful vigil keep;
Unmoved His Israel shall abide,
Since He, her Keeper by her side,
Shall slumber not nor sleep.

The Lord it is who keeps thy way,
And well He shades thy head;
No scorching sun can smite by day,
Nor moon by night with hurtful ray
Invade thy curtained bed.

He keeps thee from all evil's might,
And daily watches o'er
Thy going out at dawn of light,
Thy coming in at fall of night,
Now and for evermore.

O Lord, when fading in the West
Life's final day we see,
That we from weariness may rest
And wake in Heaven forever blest,
Do thou our Keeper be.

THE DISCIPLINE OF SORROW.

Spiritual Attainment Only Through Toil and Conflict—How the Nobler Traits of Human Character Are Brought Out.

The apostles told their converts "that we must through much tribulation enter into the Kingdom of God." This means more than that tribulation will surely meet the one who is journeying towards the better estate. It means that, by the very nature of the case, sorrow must be borne as the condition and method of attaining the more exalted life. As it is only through physical exercise that the muscles can be strengthened, so it is only through the hardships of tribulation that a man's spiritual fiber can be developed, and that he can reach the more glorious existence. Entrance into the Kingdom of God is the attainment of a higher spiritual state, and that higher, nobler spiritual existence can be reached only through the discipline of sorrow.

A man naturally desires for himself that he may have an easy time in the world. He would be glad to have all things arranged just exactly to his comfort, that no trouble or vexation should come in his way, that he should have no misfortune or disappointment, that he should glide along on the smooth stream of an uninterrupted prosperity. But if such should be his lot his character would remain undeveloped, his life would be destitute of all that is grand and heroic. He would be morally what one would be physically who had always remained at perfect rest, never exercising a muscle.

On the other hand sorrow, rightly borne, purifies and strengthens and ennobles the soul. The loftiest, sublimest natures are those which have been acquainted with grief. The greatest elevation of human character is attainable only through the discipline of trouble. Of the grandest souls that are found upon our earth, of the noblest natures that share our humanity, it must ever be said: "These are they which come out of great tribulation." It is only by such experiences that the noblest elements of man's nature can be matured. It is only through toil and conflict that spiritual strength is attained.

Here stands a young fellow who, having a rich father, has never been obliged to exert himself, and in the careless unconcern of his easy life, he is a good example of his jovial freshness of youth. But there is very little about him to interest us. If we enjoy looking at such a one it is only as we may like to look at a baby. But ten, twenty, forty years pass. He has taken a part in the stern work of life. He has had his conflicts. He has had his trials. He has had his reverses. He has become another person. His face is no longer smooth, immature and inexpressive. Care has chiseled finer lines in his brow. Conflict has given a firmer set to his lips. Trouble has touched his glance with a mellower pathos. He is a handsomer man than he was at twenty. His character has matured. His nature is expanded. And it is only through his struggles and trials that this has been brought about. If he had never had any perplexities in his life, if he had never experienced any thing but uninterrupted prosperity, he would still be uninteresting, boyish, babyish. It is only through the discipline of trial that the nobler, sublimer traits of human character are brought out.

And herein is the explanation of the fact that "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth." Whom God would train to excelence and glory He leads through tribulation and stern conflict. Those whom He destines to the highest rank in His kingdom He brings through the severest discipline.

Now it may be granted that spiritual attainments may not always be in direct proportion to the calamities one has passed through. Under the discipline of sorrow, as under muscular exercise, some may break down. The soft sandstone crumbles under the chisel; it is only the firm marble from which the master-piece may be carved. But in the strength of Christ the discipline of tribulation can be borne. Upheld by the Saviour we may bear the stern training and rejoice in it as that which shall work out in us the more glorious fruits of the Divine plan. —Christian Inquirer.

LIVING FOR A PURPOSE.

The Beauty and Strength of Christian Independence—Paul's Ideal.

St. Paul had refuted their charges; he had vindicated his motives; he had disproved their statements; he had established his claims as an apostle; he had put himself right with the church; and then, as though he desired to have done with all controversy and dispute forever, he says: "From henceforth let no man trouble me," or, in other words: "I have no time to waste upon such matters as these. They are too small, too trivial, too insignificant to engage more of my time. Life is too valuable to be frittered away after this manner. I have other and greater work to do. I can't afford to waste myself arguing about things of such little moment. I have settled this question once for all; let no man trouble me with it again."

One hardly knows which to admire most, the wisdom or the independence of this expression. It certainly is the most wise, and it certainly is most independent. As a piece of philosophy it is profound, and as an expression of the highest manliness it commands admiration; for it meant that St. Paul was going to live his own life after his own fashion; that he was not to be moved in his course by either the opposition of his enemies or the criticism of his friends; that he had choosen his own path, and in it would go on to the end, and from henceforth was not to be troubled.

Now, no one can do any thing in life until this same conclusion is reached. A life that is going to be of any value to the world must be largely independent. Real character is never a mosaic, made up of fragments taken from here and there, but a monolith, quarried in one solid piece out of the rock. Great purposes, like the oak tree, may be of slow, fibrous growth, but when the growth is attained there is a unity, an impactness, which defy the ages. The man who sets before him any noble ambition, in order to accomplish that ambition must be really independent, and live in the world not simply as an occupier but an owner. Just as a steamer pushes her way across the ocean, using the wind if it be favorable, and going through it if it be adverse, so must the one live who desires success. A life that is spent in apologies and explanations never accomplishes any thing. By stopping every little while to receive instruction and to take advice, the day of many a man has gone down, leaving his work undone. Some people are constantly excusing themselves; they are always on the defensive; they carry their hat in their hand; their very look is apologetic. They live as though they were intruders, trespassers, and seem to beg pardon of the world for living in it at all.

Now, this is a mistake. No one ever should apologize for being in this world; for this is God's world. He made it, and He gave His children rights in it—rights which are indubitable—and chief among these rights is the privilege of living our own independent life. But with many people that privilege is not claimed; they are not their own; they are the property of another. They are bought with a price, and so their life is featureless and commonplace, utterly destitute of force or character; and many a man who was intended by God to stand as a promontory reaching away out to the sea, and from which great lights would stream across the darkened waters, has allowed the conforming tide to grind the rock into pebbles and scatter it along the beach.

Many of our lives, instead of wedge-like cleaving the desert air, are but as the desert plain, only used as a common way for the caravans of the world to trample through. And yet God meant that each life would stand out like a star against the sky; receiving its own light, giving its own light, moving in its own orbit, and subject to no law but the law of its own system. And this was the ideal to which St. Paul was reaching, therefore he would not be troubled by those who differed from him.

In fact, the less we think about other people, and what other people think about us, the more likely we are to make our life a success. Thousands of people are in bondage to other people. They are afraid of them—afraid of what they may say, of what they may do, and they are thus kept in subjection. Hence it is that so few lives are unique. But a real man is not troubled in this way. In him the quality of unconsciousness is strongly developed. He seems not to think about other people. He goes up to the mount of duty or sacrifice, and when he returns never once thinks about the light that is on his face, or what his friends may say of him. No real man ever troubles himself about popular opinion. The press to him is no mirror where he finds himself reflected. Plaudits and hosannas in no wise affect his course. No truly great man is anxious to appear in history; he makes history. And this is the ideal of every strong, well-rounded character.—Rev. J. Wesley Johnston.

WISE SAYINGS.

—Discontent is the want of self-reliance; it is infirmity of will.—R. W. Emerson.

—Be wise by choosing wisely what to do; be strong by doing well what you have chosen.—S. Osgood.

—That man is perfect in faith who can come to God in the utter dearth of his feelings and his desires, without a glow or an aspiration, with the weight of low thoughts, failures, neglects and wandering forgetfulness, and say to Him: "Thou art my refuge, because Thou art my home."—George MacDonald.

—"If God be for us, who can be against us?" The man whom God defends, and means to bless, nobody can effectually harm. Let that man be at peace, and not be alarmed at any thing. All things will at last turn out right in respect to him, and all alike work together for his good.—N. Y. Independent.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—Bananas and Cream: Heap upon a glass dish eight or ten ice cold bananas, sliced thin; sprinkle with powdered sugar; pour over them a cupful of whipped cream, also ice cold, and serve with light plain cake.—Good Housekeeping.

—Honey or sugar should always be given to the bees on the inside of the hive, to prevent robbing. A good feeder is made by taking a shallow dish and placing within it plenty of little floats of wood to prevent the bees from being drowned in the liquid.—Prairie Farmer.

—To clean a carpet that has been taken up, first shake, then putting it on a line, beat with a branch of a tree with many twigs, trimmed smoothly that it may not catch in the threads, then, most important of all, sweep thoroughly on both sides, while it is spread on the grass.

—Shade trees that send out roots to great distances, only to throw out shoots and suckers, should be dug up. The aspen, though a beautiful tree, is as great a nuisance as the Canada thistle, and yet it is planted along the roads every season. If permitted it will completely overrun adjoining fields, and is not easily exterminated.

—A cool cellar does not mean a damp cellar. The cellar should be well aired every day, and also given a good whitewashing whenever it is necessary to do so. Before storing any crops in the cellar, every portion of the cellar should be thoroughly cleaned, and if it have a cement floor it should even be well scrubbed.

—No kind of grain is so well adapted to feeding young stock of any kind as oats. Their large proportion of husks keeps them from cloying the stomach even of stock that has too poor digestion for thriving on corn. Pigs will prefer the latter grain, if both are given together, but the pig is not the best judge of what is adapted to his needs. The oats should, however, be at least full weight to give the best result.

—Rice cream is particularly good. Boil a tablespoonful of rice in rather more than a half pint of milk until quite soft, turn it into a mortar and pound it so that no whole grains are visible; put it in a basin, whip half a pint of cream, sweeten and flavor with vanilla, add one-quarter of an ounce of isinglass dissolved in a teacup of milk, beat up with the rice and pour into a mold. Some whipped cream slightly colored with cochineal and placed in tiny heaps round it when turned out of the mold, makes a pretty dish.

—Dairy farming furnishes a constant source of income. It enriches the land more rapidly than other branch of animal husbandry. It may be carried on with small capital without danger of being smothered by larger establishments. It is profitable on high-priced lands, where other cattle would not more than make a good rent. In short, dairy farming, like every other branch of agriculture, has advantages peculiar to itself which makes it in many places and under many circumstances a desirable and remunerative employment.

HINTS ON DISINFECTION.

Nine Articles for the Successful Prevention of Disease Germs.

First. Corrosive sublimate (mercuric chloride), sulphate of copper, and chloride of lime are among our best disinfectants, the first two being poisonous. At wholesale drug houses single pounds can be obtained, mercuric chloride costing seventy-five cents, the others ten cents a pound.

Second. A quarter of a pound of corrosive sublimate and a pound of sulphate of copper in one gallon of water makes a concentrated solution to keep in stock. We will refer to it as "solution A."

Third. For the ordinary disinfecting solution add half a pint of "solution A" to a gallon of water. This, while costing less than a cent and a half per gallon, is a good strength for general use. Use in about equal quantity in disinfecting choleric or typhoid fever excreta.

Fourth. A four per cent. solution of good chloride of lime or a quarter pint of "solution A" to a gallon of water is used to wash wood-work floors, and wooden furniture, after fumigation and ventilation.

Fifth. For fumigating with sulphur, three to four pounds should be used to every thousand cubic feet air space. Burn in an old tin basin floating in a tub of water; keep room closed twelve hours, to allow the fumes to penetrate all cracks. Then open a window from the outside and allow fumes to escape into air.

Sixth. Soak sheets, etc., in chloride of lime solution, wring out and boil.

Seventh. Cesspools, etc., should be well covered on top with a mixture of chloride of lime with ten parts of dry sand.

Eighth. Isolate the patient in an upper room from which curtains, carpets, and stuffed furniture have been removed.

Ninth. The solution of mercuric chloride must not be placed in metal vessels, since the mercury would plate them.—Lucius Pitkin, in Century.

—A novel instrument was filed the other day at Springfield, Mo., by George Schmidt, in the shape of a deed adopting Maggie Brown, the three-year-old daughter of Julia Brown. In consideration of one dollar the mother agrees to relinquish all legal rights and privileges over her child, and the foster father agrees to properly support and maintain her, to treat her humanely, and properly feed, clothe, shelter and educate her.

MAKING FARMING PAY.

It Can Be Done by Conducting Work on Strict Business Principles.

The farmer is self-sustaining and his living is insured, to say the least. This ought to bring contentment. The fact that now and then a merchant secures large wealth by favorable accidents and extensive operations should not blind us to the fact that in proportion to the number engaged, a great many more farmers than merchants advance to independence, if not wealth. The average mechanic seldom lays by enough to buy himself a little home, to say nothing of a surplus for a "rainy day." Those who earnestly follow agricultural pursuits never fail to have comfortable food and clothing, and homes for themselves and families. In order to make farming pay we should first of all secure a better knowledge of our calling. The doctor, to be successful, must be educated in his profession. The lawyer, minister, and in fact all engaged in professional business, must be educated in their calling to be successful. And farmers who expect to make money in such times as these must use brains as well as muscle. They must get out of the old ruts or they will be left far in the rear. It is not advisable to go in debt at any time, but just now we should be especially particular not to buy and [illegible] our ability to pay. There is no more occasion for running in debt now than when farm products brought in twice as much money as they do at present. A bushel of wheat will buy as many yards of calico, as many pounds of sugar or nails, as it would when we got a dollar and a half for it. And as long as it will do this the farmer should not grumble.

If you are a young man just starting out with capital to invest, never put it into a poor farm. It will take a lifetime to bring it up to the point where it can be farmed profitably, and then you will be ready to die. Go where land is good and cheap. In improving your farm put up good and substantial buildings. If you can not finish as you would like let the work be good as far as it goes. Keep on good terms with your neigbors by keeping four fences in good repair, and make it a rule never to borrow, and when you can do so without incurring the displeasure of a neighbor too much, refuse to lend. No man has any more right to ask for the freeuse of implements than to ask for the ban of a cow for a few days, to increase the income from his dairy. Where armers are located near each other they may find it to their mutual advantage to purchase farm implements in partnership, or exchange implements when it can be done without interfering with each other's plans or putting back work in the very busiest season. But this is quite different from wholesale borrowing without any intention of returning an equivalent.

What you should grow must depend upon the locality of your farm. If you are dissatisfied with the returns the crops you have been cultivating have brought in, try a new departure, but feel your way slowly. Don't venture too much. It is a very good rule to throw your strength into the leading crop of your locality, carrying one or two others along to fall back on in case of bad luck with your leading crop, and be sure to keep a part of your farm in grass and clover, even if you only have ten acres. You must increase your manure supply in every way possible. Manure is cash; at least if you don't make it on the farm you are out the cash for commercial fertilizers if you succeed in growing paying crops. Have good stock to work and good tools to work with, and when you get through with your tools see that they are carefully housed. In preparing for any crop let your land be thoroughly prepared before seeding. Let this be an invariable rule. In cultivating begin early and let your work be thorough, so that you may be able to keep ahead of the weeds. When your crop is ready to harvest delay no time in getting it housed. Sell all your surplus and let nothing go to waste. If you feed your grain give your stock the very best care and attention. Lastly, take good farm papers and keep posted on the crop prospects, so you will know when to sell to best advantage the produce of the farm.—W. W. Stevens, in Ohio Farmer.

LURCHING BACKWARDS.

Explanation of a Sensation Experienced by All Railway Travelers.

Some one asks why when a train is approaching a station and the passengers are standing, that at the moment the train stops they all lurch backward instead of forward, as the laws of momentum would seem to compel them. And he says the backward lurch depends upon the suddenness of the stop.

The answer seems to me simple. The backward lurch is only indirectly in proportion to the suddenness of the stop; really it is in proportion to the extent of instinctive anticipation and preparation for a forward lurch. Were the train to stop suddenly and unexpectedly there would be no backward lurch; the laws of momentum would act directly, and possibly hurl the passengers through the forward door and windows. But as the speed is gradually lessened the passengers standing in the aisle instinctively resist the momentum of their own bodies by leaning backward. This action on their part will be very perceptible to one observing them from a seat. When the actual stop comes it finds them in a state of over-preparation, so to speak, the force of gravity being in excess of that of momentum, and they tend to fall backward, this and the instinctive act of recovery constituting the backward lurch.—Cor. Boston Budget.

They Never Fail.

NO. 3 FULTON MARKET, NEW YORK CITY, January 26, 1884.

I have been using BRANDRETH'S PILLS for the last ten years. They are a wonderful medicine. There is nothing equal to them as Blood Purifiers and Liver Regulators. But I wish to state how remarkably they cure rheumatism, and how easily; I was affected by rheumatism of the legs. My business (wholesale fish dealer) naturally leads me to damp places. I was so bad I could not walk, and at night I suffered fearfully; I tried Balsams, Sarsaparillas and all kinds of tinctures, but they did me no good and I was afraid of being a cripple. I finally commenced using BRANDRETH'S PILLS. I took two every night for ten nights, then I began to improve. I continued taking them for forty days and I got entirely well. Now, whenever sick, I take BRANDRETH'S PILLS. They never fail.

ATTENTION REPUBLICANS.

THE REPUBLICAN VOTERS of the several Election Districts of Garrett county, are requested to assemble in primary meeting on SATURDAY, AUGUST 18th,

1888, for the purpose of selecting 5 delegates from each Election District to attend a County Convention to be held on TUESDAY, AUGUSTS 21st,

1888, for the purpose of selecting 3 delegates to attend the Congressional District Convention for the Sixth Congressional District of Maryland, to be held in Rockville, on 1888, at which convention a candidate for Congress will be nominated.

The primaries will be held from 3 to 4 o'clock P. M., at the usual places.

The Committees for the several districts will make all necessary arrangements.

If the voters in any of the districts desire a change in their respective districts committees, they will so instruct their delegates to the County Convention.

By order of the State Central Committee.

D. CHISHOLM,
Chairman.

The Republican Nominee.

The Times, the degenerate organ of the divided and demoralized Democracy of Allegany county, in its usual meddlesome spirit, and a manner peculiarly characteristic to it and its more degenerate editor, takes umbrage at our comments on a clipping from the Baltimore Herald, purporting to be part of an interview with Mr. Wellington, and in a passion, under the above caption, assaults this journal, McComas and the people of Garrett county.

Perhaps it might be well to "consider the source" and pass it by, but before doing this we desire to say a few words.

We have no apology to make, and no excuse to offer for what we have said. It was said through no want of respect or kind feeling for Mr. Wellington, but to correct a wrong impression created by the statement in the Herald.

We did not and do not question Mr. Wellington's veracity, but we meant, and do now say, that if that statement be true, then his friends have misrepresented to him the sentiment of the Republicans of this county, which is overwhelmingly in favor of Mr. McComas, as will appear in convention.

We are firmly convinced that McComas is the strongest candidate in the Sixth District, both by reason of his personal popularity, his ability, his application and activity, his experience, his pronounced adherence to Republican principles, and advocacy of a protective tariff, and therefore favor and urge his re-nomination.

Unlike the Times we are actuated in our course only by a clear conscience, doing that which we believe to be for the best interests of the Republican party, the people of this county and Congressional District, exercising a free will, unbiased judgment, the right of free speech, and the powers conferred upon us as free moral agents, untrammeled and unfettered by reason of "subsidies," "accommodations" or other obligations to McComas, Wellington or any one else.

Only once before have we heard the word "subsidized" used in connection with or reference to a paper in Western Maryland, and never to any west of Cumberland. Previous to the Democratic State Convention last year it was currently rumored that one Democratic journal was "subsidized" into urging upon the people the candidacy for Governor of a prominent Baltimore city gentleman, who, however, failed to receive the nomination.

No promises or pledges were made by McComas two years ago, as intimated by the Times, its zeal here going as usual, beyond the truth, and we defy it or any person to produce the proof of any such promises having been made by him or with his authority.

Mr. Wellington at that time submitted not because of any such promises, but rather because four of the five counties were united on McComas and there was no possible show for the nomination of anyone else. He simply "submitted to the inevitable," and was not "compelled to support" the ticket, but, like the good Republican he is, earnestly desired and labored for its success, as we believe he will again do this fall, whether successful or unsuccessful in his aspirations, freely and voluntarily.

The motive of the Times is apparrent, and the author of that article is either a fool or must regard the people of Allegany county as imbecile if he thinks it is not understood by the most indifferent and unsuspecting. With a divided and demoralized party the Democrats are hopelessly in the minority in that county, unless the same state of affairs is made to prevail in the Republican party, and to bring this about the Times is now endeavoring to increase the dissatisfaction in our ranks, to widen the breach existing, encourageing the factional fights and cause such a feeling as will disrupt the party, materially reduce or wipe out altogether the Republican majority in Allegany, and thus ensure the election of Douglass. But it will not succeed. We venture the assertion that whoever is nominated the result will be the same, and therefore must necessarily incline to the opinion that the people are not imbeciles.

We would further have the Times and the people of Allegany, understand that we do not regard Allegany and Garrett in the relation of parent and child. It is true Garrett was formed out of part of Allegany, as was Allegany of part of Washington, but we are sister counties, with equal rights and privileges, and with the right, will, and determination to govern ourselves and control our own affairs, politically and otherwise, and propose to do it without the intervention of outside parties and influences.

The Fight for the Sixth Congressional District.

Once more we are to have a fierce fight to save the Sixth Congressional District of Maryland. The Democracy nominated their candidate on May 24th. The Prohibitionists placed a candidate in nomination on July 21st. The Republicans will nominate Mr. McComas on August 23rd.

Of course the third party did all it could, and will do all it can, to help elect a Democrat. As two years ago they took their candidate for Congress from the Republican stronghold of Middletown, in Frederick county, so this year they select Mr. Moore from the Republican stronghold of Sandy Spring, in Montgomery county. Out of nearly one hundred election districts in the Sixth Congressional District, the third party, has, in succession, chosen its candidate from districts almost entirely Republican in sentiment. They follow the renegade St. John in hating the Republican party more than they hate whiskey and in sneakingly doing their part as assistant Democrats.

We attended the meeting of the Republican State Central Committee and have beside, recently had full and detailed information from every county in this Congressional district. Montgomery, Garrett and Frederick counties are solidly in favor of the renomination of Mr. McComas. Hon. Milton G. Urner, that wise and able leader, says that nine-tenths of the Republicans of Frederick county are favorable to his renomination. We state what all our readers know, when we say that Washington county is absolutely and enthusiastically for our present member to succeed himself and, with emphatic unanimity, greater than ever before, if that be possible.

Allegany county, as two years ago, presents the only division. Now, as then, Mr. Wellington is a candidate and is working for the nomination. We are informed that now, as then, the miners of Allegany, who make the coal regions the bulwark of our party, stand solidly for the renomination of Mr. McComas, who has so faithfully watched over their interests, who struck coal from the free list and amended the contract labor law so as to prevent the wholesale importation of foreign labor ever again in that region. Whether the lower end of Allegany, and Cumberland, shall defeat the choice of the miners, remains to be seen. However, it matters little, since the other four counties are united for Mr. McComas, and Allegany will, as it did two years ago, unite with the others to give him a safe majority.

We are amused at the Democratic correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, who manufactures opposition in the hope that the Democrats may thus arouse it. The Democrats will gladly help nominate anybody but McComas. They know, after the fierce fight of two years ago, that he can surely save this district, while they are confident of victory with a new man for our candidate. But the Republicans take pride in having a Representative whose prominence in the councils of the party and in the National Legislature gives prominence to the district; and at this important juncture, when the tariff fight involves all our industries, they want to keep in his seat a man whoie capacity, experience and influence will serve both the district and the State better than any new man possibly can.

This district has a right to have a leader in Congress and will keep McComas there another term. The most intelligent and wisest communities retain men of experience and influence in Congress, because they believe it best helps the country and themselves. They believe a member of Congress is elected to serve people and not simply to receive a compliment. There is no such thing as rotation in the nomination. It is always the people's time to select the fittest man to fill this public trust. Many have been in Congress for twenty-five years—nearly all our leading men for twelve or fifteen years—and the State, that sends Mr. Gorman for twelve years to legislate under the same roof with Mr. McComas, intends, through the Republicans of this district, to send Mr. McComas there eight years.—Hagerstown Herald and Torch Light.

Mr. McComas' Strength.

Many Republicans from Montgomery and Frederick counties have been in Washington recently and have given opportunity to dicuss the widely circulated reports of opposition to Mr. McComas' renomination. Montgomery, Washington and Frederick are solidly for McConas, as is also Garrett. Mr. Wellington is, on good authority, again said to be a candidate for Congress, and Allegany's course is, therefore, uncertain. But it is generally reported that the miners of Allegany earnestly favor Mr. McComas, who in the past has shown himself to be their constant and active friend. The next Congress, whatever its political complexion may be, will frame either a tariff or a revenue bill which will become a law. Maryland, and Mr. McComes' district most particularly, will be deeply interested in that law, and it is of paramount interest to the Sixth district that its representative be a man of influence, whose voice will be distinctly heard in the framing of that law. No new man, however capable or earnest, could hope in his first session to influence the provisions of that bill. Fortunately, however, in Mr. McComas the industrial interests of Maryland, and especially of the Sixth district, have a representative who has been welcomed by his party to its most important councils, and whose judgment will surely be consulted in the measure to be adopted. Hence it is natural that Mr. McComas' renomination meets with the cordial and unanimous support of Montgomery, Frederick, Washington and Garrett. Meanwhile Mr. McComas remains steadfastly at his post, hastening home at intervals by serious illness in his family.—Balto. American.

Supporting American Ideas.

WHEELING, W. VA., July 17.—Mayor Samuel Murray, of New Cumberland, the leading Democrat of Hancock county, has come out for Harrison on the protection issue. He says: 'The way a man thinks he should vote, and an American citizen, native or adopted, should cling to the principle none can gainsay, 'America for Americans.' Why should I regard former party affiliations when I see that some party aiming a death blow at the future prosperity of me and mine, and not only that, but of the whole country. A man should take a broader view than merely his own or his family's interest. One family depends upon another in this great family of States, and the American people should rise in their might, and when November comes, crush this unpatriotic doctrine with the weight of American ballots."

Ex-Speaker Dunn, of the New Jersey State Assembly, and a prominent Democratic politician of Elizabenth, N. J., is out for Harrison and Morton. He says he is disgusted with the Democratic party since it has become a free trade organization. He says: "It is a toss up of a copper cent with me whether or not I shall stump the State for Harrison and Morton. The Irish-Americans at Elizabethport, where I live will vote the protection ticket almost to a man."

The Dutiful Party.

The Mills bill is before the Senate for amendment, and the amendment is about to be prepared. The Republican Senators have acted the part of wisdom in determining to prepare a bill which shall really provide for a reduction of the revenues and at the same time shall lower taxes. The unanimity of the Senators is very gratifying. It shows, no matter what may have been previous discussions and suggestions, that the party which is in control of the Senate takes a proper view of its responsibilities and is worthy to be entrusted with the task of legislation. It is reported that Mr. Allison employed as an argument to secure assent to his proposition that if Congress adjourned and the Republicans declined to present a measure of their own, or to act on the Mills bill, Mr. Cleveland would recall them, and once more address Congress on the subject of the surplus. This report is the purest twaddle and is characteristic of the free trade source from which it comes. The President certainly would not convene Congress to remedy some act which the Republicans had omitted. The air is full of rumors, but this one is the most absurd of all that are flying about. The Republicans have decided to present a bill because it is their duty to do all in their power to secure legislation on the subject of the surplus. Mr. Allison, more than almost any man in public life, is devoted to the tasks which are entrusted to him, and is a legislator who believes that his duties are to the people and the whole country. He and his colleagues are not partisan tricksters. The free trader who invented the report to which we have alluded is mistaken. He is judging the Republicans from his own point of view, and that is false. The duty of Congress is to reduce the surplus. The only tolerable manner of accomplishing this object is to reduce revenues, which means the reduction of taxes. The Democrats held the laboring oar, because they had control of the house of Congress which has exclusive original jurisdiction in revenue matters. They presented a bill which makes some slight reduction of revenue by lowering certain internal taxes and by making some additions to the free list. But the reduction of revenue needed is something like $70,000,000, and the certain reductions proposed by the Mills bill are less than $25,000,000. Besides the changes suggested in the internal tax law and the additions to the free list, the Democrats proposed to make reductions by decreasing rates of duties. It is probable that the changes proposed in the dutiable list would, however, increase the revenue. That has been the result of all slight changes in rates. A few years ago the Republicans undertook to reduce the rates about 20 per cent., and the revenues are greater now than they were. The reductions in the aggregate of the Mills bill are inconsiderable, but on the articles affected they amount to an average of 36 per cent. Nevertheless we should expect that the result of the adoption of the Mills bill would be a material increase of revenue in a few years, for the increased income that would follow reduction of values would more than counterbalance the certain reductions occasioned by the lowering of internal taxes, and the additions to the free list. There is no reason to suppose that the men who prepared and pushed the measure through the House of Representatives were not aware that this might be the effect of their enterprise. But, as a matter of fact, they were not honest. They intended to make pretence of trying to reduce the revenue, and, under that deception, secured votes for free trade. They knew that their measure could not become a law, and they impudently refused to try to make a practicable measure, one that would accomplish a reduction, and at the same time leave the tariff issue for the future consideration. They seem to have no faith in their power to secure free trade on its merits. They would not, therefore, consent to a postponement of the question to a time when it might be deliberately considered and settled. They insisted upon taking advantage of the country's anxiety to get out of its financial difficulties, and, taking business by the throat, cried out in the spirit and with the voice of a highwayman: "Give us free trade or lose your currency." This bullying method, however, does not frighten the country. The Republicans have now an opportunity which they have wisely decided to take advantage of. They will introduce a bill that will reduce revenues and taxes, and about the results of which there will be no doubt. They will offer the Democrats a sensible and practical measure, and it will go hard with the latter if they do not accept it. Whether they pass it or reject it, however, the Republicans will stand before the country as public men who have done their whole duty and who present a striking and honorable contrast to the greedy seekers after party issues, who have refused to relieve a monetary condition which their President has declared to be threatening to the business interests and the prosperity of the country.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

Political Notes.

PALMYRA, N. J., July 30.—An important gain to the Republican party in this place is found in the defection of Prohibitionists from the third party ranks. Mr. W. C. Randolph, a manufacturer who has supported Prohibition in the past and intended to cast his vote for Fisk and Brooks, since the drawing of the lines between the two great parties, refuses to be a brevet Democrat and give an indirect vote for free trade. He will cast his ballot for Harrison and Morton and in support of the Republican policy of Protection to American homes and American labor. He is joined by Mr. Thomas Wells, who has heretofore voted with the Prohibitionists. Several old time Democrats have privately declared for Harrison and Morton.

WASHINGTON, July 30.—Representative Nichols, of North Carolina, said to-day: "The campaign in the North State is already in full blast. We have a big State to go over, and not as many railroads as you have in the North, so it takes longer to do the campaigning. From the present outlook I am inclined to believe that the Prohibitionists will poll a vote that will be a sad surprise to Democrats, from whose party they will draw nearly all their votes. The outlook in the State for Republican success is really very encouraging, and I believe there is a good square chance of carrying the State. The Prohibition candidate for Governor is a strong man, and they will poll a large vote in the middle counties, where it will count most."

It is reported that the Hon, Levi J. De Land, of Fairport, N, Y., will vote for Harrison. Mr. DeLand is a large manufacturer, giving support to several hundred men, most of whom own their own houses in that beautiful town. Heretofore they have voted solidly the Democratic ticket, as Mr. DeLand has been an uncompromising Democrat, having been a member of the Assembly and a member of the Democratic State Executive Committee for several years. Thus the changes go on—at first a few, then more, then many, and at last an avalanche,

Mr. Will K. Chapin, vice-president of the Rochester, (N. Y.) Car Wheel Company., states to his friends that the company and its employes cannot live under the Mills bill and that they will support Harrison and Morton this year. Four years ago Mr. Chapin was one of the most enthusiastic of Cleveland's admirers and gave liberally to the campaign fund.

RICHMOND, July 30.—General Jas. A. Walker, of Wytheville, who was Lieutenant Governor of the State under the Democratic rule of Governor Holliday, has come to the Republican ranks. He says he cannot stand Free Trade and cannot vote for Cleveland and predicts that Southwestern Virginia will go for Harrison and Morton.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 30.—Representative Foran says that he calculates the next House will be Republican by about ten to fifteen majority. He expects that his own districts and Mr. Campbell's in Ohio, will be lost to the Democrats.

The Saturday News of Lewisburg, Pa., has come out for Harrison and Morton.

Not a Cowardly Party.

Of course the Republicans of the Senate will submit a measure to reduce the surplus in the Treasury. They know before they offer it that the Free Trade Democracy will not accept it, for it will not be a Free Trade measure.

But the Republicans in the Senate will offer their bill because they ought to, and because the Republican party is not a cowardly party. It does not at all times and in all things go so far as some of its members would have it go, but it has always gone to the front when a great principle was to be asserted, and this is the present condition.

There is an assault on the policy which has made this the greatest of the nations of the earth. The Republican party declares its purpose to resist this assault and, if the people give it the opportunity, to show that the surplus may be reduced without reducing the wages of American labor. This is the issue, and this is why the Senate will offer a tariff bill. —Wheeling Intelligencer.

A few days ago there passed through the New York custom house an invoice of 75,000 campaign buttons, made in England, to be used as Democratic badges. Each bears on its face the name of "Cleveland." It is eminently proper that the campaign badges of the free-trade Democracy should be made in England.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, July 30, 1888.—Senator Wilson, of Iowa, from the committee on education and labor, has reported favorably to the Senate the House bill creating boards of arbitration for settling controversies between railroads and their employees.

Representative Dingley, of Maine, has introduced a bill in the House providing for tolls upon Canadian vessels passing through St. Mary's and St. Clair Flats canals against our vessels or ports.

Mr. Randall was well enough to be removed to Pennsylvania Saturday.

The Senate, by a very decisive vote refused to prohibit the use of steam plate printing machines in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

So certain are the Democrats of the rejection of the fisheries treaty, that Senator Morgan, of Alabama, in making a speech in favor of the treaty, advised Cleveland to withdraw it until after the election, in order to prevent the Republicans from using it as campaign material. This was a very significant suggestion, but Cleveland will hardly dare to act upon it, however much he might wish to do so. The more the treaty is debated, the worse the administration appears. Republican Senators will endeavor to push it to a vote this week.

There never was such a demand for tariff documents from all over the country as at present. The Republican Congressional committee, which will have the preparation of all Republican documents, have opened their headquarters here, and will shortly be prepared to fill all demands.

The whiskey trust has been undergoing an investigation for several days. Nothing startling has so far been discovered.

A funny sort of a fairy story has been gotten up by an agent of the Treasury Department. He claims that he knows of many millions of dollars worth of property, which belonged to the late Confederate States' government, in Europe and in this country, which is at present in such a shape that much of it may be recovered by the United States. He goes into particulars, and furnishes a catalogue of vessels, machinery, and real estate, and cash. He was formerly in the employ of the rebel government.

Chief Justice Fuller has been here for several days.

It is thought here that ex-Senator Mahone will be returned to Congress from the Fourth Virginia district.

Representative Burrows, of Michigan, is working like a steam engine to get the dependent pension bill up in the House. He refuses to allow unanimous consent to be given for any resolution setting days for the consideration of any special measure, unless a provision is included setting aside a day for the consideration of the dependent pension bill. The action of Mr. Burrows is creating almost a panic among the Democratic members. If the dependent pension bill ever comes to a vote, it is sure to pass, as a large number of the Democrats are afraid to vote against it, but they hope by underhand tactics to prevent its getting before the House.

Cleveland is always prating about the duties of his position, etc., and yet, last Thursday, with quite a number of important bills awaiting his action, he ran off to New York to go on a yachting trip, without saying a word to anyone. If he does not return to-morrow several branches of the government will have to come to a stand-still for lack of appropriations, as the joint resolution extending the old 30 days, expired to-day. A new extension of 30 days has been passed by Congress, but cannot go into effect until it receives his signature.

There is a report here which is believed by many, that after the election Cleveland is to fire Black out of the Pension Office. Black says there is no truth in it, but then he would not be likely to know.

The Republican Senators have fully determined to report a tariff bill as a substitute for the Mills bill. It is expected that it will be ready in about two weeks. It is thought that the principal reductions will be on sugar and tobacco.

Senator Hiscock has introduced a bill to pension all persons who served three monshs in the United States' army or navy during the rebellion.

Cleveland was in a big hurry to get off Thursday, but he stopped long enough to veto a private pension bill.

Senator Palmer, of Michigan, has written a letter declining to be a candidate for re-election.

Mr. Jno. A. Brooks, Prohibition nominee for Vice President, is a hard hitter. Observe how he goes about his work:

I have been a rebel, a slaveholder and a fire-eating Democrat, but thank God I have never been a Republican and I have not that sin to answer for.

Death of Samuel Engle.

GRANTSVILLE, July 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR:—Mr. Samuel Engle, one of Garrett county's oldest and prominent citizens, died at his residence, four miles south of Grantsville, on the 28th inst., more from age than any specific disease. He was about eighty years old, but hale, hearty and active till the past few months, since when general decay rapidly came upon him. Death appeared, if not welcome at least expectedly, and while in the midst of his family, holding him in great esteem and affection. Mr. Engle had been thrice married, his last wife being Catharine Hoye, widow of the late William Ridgely, whom he left as his widow—a lady of much excellency of character. The deceased had nine children in all, two of whom are dead; a majority living in the West. Born in Pennsylvania,—removed to the farm where he died about 55 years ago. A tiller of the soil all the days of his natural life, and a good one, as his well cultivated lands fully attest. Always present and foremost in his practical operations. He was industrious, energetic and thrifty, with good practical ideas and judgment. An honest, positive and upright citizen, who will be very much missed, not merely in his neighborhood, but in the county. He was an active member and helper of the church. Here, too, his usefulness will be missed. Stern and resolute in all business transactions, yet he had a heart ever ready to the just appeals of charity. All agree that Grantsville district has sustained a permanent loss.

OLD ACQUAINTANCE.

FOXTOWN, August 1st, 1888.

MR. EDITOR:—I will write you again something for the columns of your old time-time Democratic paper. My private letter to you last winter was mislaid and by some means it was published in that obnoxious black Republican paper. I am discouraged. This life seems filled with discouragements. In my young days things were better managed, but since the beginning of the war all has gone wrong. In the first place all the boys said the South was sure to win and the nigger would have to be put down. I voted against Abe Lincoln and his hirelings, and always done all I could to encourage our party to oppose the war, and now what is the result: Here I am in my old days; no game, no fish, lots of my neighbors who were on the Abolitionist side are getting pensions and have good times, and plenty tobacco and other things; and now they tell me that the Democrats are going in for free trade. Somehow we always get on the wrong side of the fence. Just about the time that we begin to get in clover some fool from down South shoves us over into the briar field again. Last winter when Tom, Dick and Cap passed the law to bounce Bartlett for going back on the ticket I thought it was a good thing. We would hoist Bartlett and I would stand a chance to get a good fat job. But they say up at the store that Will Hinebaugh is put in for Examiner. I thought you fellows had your eye on me for School Examiner. Some people down here say I ain't fit, but they are prejudiced. Because ain't Christ, Snyder and Hen. Zinkan and Hen. Kale and Hen. Lininger and Hen. Davis all got good offices. I expect you have heard I taught school once. It does me good to look back at the good old times when I used to send out for a birch and stand them all up in a row; but I won't commence. Times have changed for certain. Now, Mr. Editor, put in your paper that the Mills bill don't mean anything. We first let on to put everything free to suit some of our men down South who are always true to the party. We did not expect to pass it anyhow. Mr. Editor, could you have a law passed to put out Sam Lawton and Zell Tower, John Dunham and Ross Compton at once. There is a lot of men down this way who are talking of going back on us, and they are all good men and you might let me have Sam Lawton's place and that would leave room for three more. The Republicans are getting impudent and they need a little taking down. Mr. Editor, I hope it ain't so that some niggers are going to vote for Cleveland for then we can't say the Democratic party is the white man's party any more, and lots of old Democrats will go back on us and just as likely as not vote for Harrison. Mr. Editor, please write to Gorman or some one who has all the money and tell him that unless he sends some money out here at once we will lose some votes, or he might send us a keg of whiskey in a box direct. A lot of us was sitting in the store the other day when Chauncey read out of his New York World that the Republicans were for free whiskey, sure and certain, and it had a bad effect on every Democrat that heard it. I will wait anxiously for some word about it—the keg I mean.

Yours,
OLD HICKORY.

P. S.—Don't forget about the w—y, and send it direct to me, and I will put it where it will do the most good.

Mountain Lake Park.

I wish to begin just where I left off last week, as the W. C. T. U. programme was so well and fully carried out.

Dr. A. B. Leonard, of Ohio gave a most excellent address on Thursday afternoon.

General Fisk dropped in again while Dr. Leonard was speaking and as son as he had completed his address the General made a few well chosen remarks concerning the work of the ladies and of the temperance cause in general. But said nothing about the third party and had no abuses for the old parties.

Friday was a grand day. There were a number of excursionists from the early trains. In the afternoon Hon. Samuel Dickie, of Ohio, delivered one of the most logical and pointed addresses on the different phases of the temperance question.

As General Fisk had been announced the day before, he again spoke, and more lengthy than before, and in such a kind, gentlemanly way that no one could take offense.

The speaking and singing by the quartet continued until about nine o'clock when refreshments were served again as they had been on Wednesday night.

This was certainly the most pleasant and successful session the ladies have ever held here.

On Sunday a very good conference meeting was held from nine to ten-thirty. Just at the close of this Rev. Mr. Cornelius, of Baltimore, preached an excellent sermon. Sabbath School at two.

After a half hour's service of song in the evening, Dr. Stone, late from India, conducted a very interesting young people's meeting,

Monday and Tuesday were spent in preparing for the Assembly. We notice quite a number of strangers on the grounds, and several of the lecturers are here this (Tuesday) evening.

The supper given by the Ladies Assembly Aid Society was largely attended and well patronized.

There was a grand display of fireworks, the best we have ever had.

Accident.

Mr. Gnagey is visiting friends at Grantsville.

Messrs. Wiley and Rush, who were injured, are recovering rapidly.

One of the most destructive storms we ever witnessed passed over this section on Sunday, 29th inst.

The Normal school commenced on Monday with 26 scholars enrolled. From 35 to 40 are expected when all get in.

We are under obligations to Ephraim Enlow for the favor of a hand some invitation to attend the graduating exercises at Mt. Union, Ohio.

Word has reached here that Mr. Geo. Kolb has reached California and is well pleased so far.

Mr. Isaiah Friend is putting up a handsome house on Elder Hill.

The Spurlines start their thrasher this week.

Hon. Silas Weimer has the promise of the Accident school for next winter.

Quite a number of summer visitors passed through here last week on their way to Deer Park, Oakland and Mountain Lake Park.

The Comptroller of the State has recognized Wm. Hinebaugh as Treasurer of the School Board, which, it is now thought here, will settle the school board matter. G.

[From another correspondent.]

Accident presents a lively appearance since Normal School has commenced. Accident always has been and always should be the place for the Normal. We have a splendid instructor, Prof. Geo. Royer, who understands the business. The scholars talk of organizing a literary society.

Mr. Jacob Miller and wife expect to leave soon for Arkansas.

Mr. Frederic Englehardt is putting up a new dwelling house for Mr. Henry Feik.

Mr. John Englehardt will teach school above Oakland next winter.

Mr. S. E. Boyer, of Oakland, paid us a visit this week.

Mr. Truman Pysell, of Flatwoods, was married on last Tuesday evening to Miss Dolly Yoder. On Wednesday evening the young folks of Flatwoods gave him a general serenade. Mr. Pysell was much pleased and returns hearty thanks to the young people.

One day last week while Mr. Alex Fresh was going to the field for a load of hay the wagon tongue accidentally struck his best horse on the leg and broke it, which resulted in the animal's death.

Mr. James E. McGettigan is preparing to build a dwelling house.

Deer Park.

Bessie Thrasher, a bright little daugher of Mr. B. F. Thrasher, nearly nine years old died last Thursday night, after an illness of less than a week. She was one of the most interesting children in the whole town, and although so young, was one of the most promising members of the Band of Hope, of the sewing school and Sunday school. With a remarkably correct and sweet little voice, always ready to lead or join in all the children's songs. Her sorrowing parents have the sympathy of the whole community. She was buried on Saturday. The funeral services, conducted by Revs. G. W. W. Amick, were held in the Lutheran Church, which was very beautifully decorated with flowers. The little girles of the sewing school sang at the grave a favorite hymn of little Bessie's, "I will stand up for Jesus."

Miss Annie Graham, of Piedmont, and Miss Daisy Easter, of Baltimore, are visiting Mrs. D. F. Graham.

Miss Ida Head, of Davis, is at present with her sister, Mrs. C. H. Tilson.

Miss Mathilde Droege is at home during her summer vacation.

Miss Daisy Lewis, of Vienna, Va., spent a few days last week with Mrs. L. H. Schoolfield.

Miss Mamie Jones and Miss Mamie Waters, of Montgomery county, are visiting Misses Mattie and Katie Davis.

Mrs. M. E. Porter, of Poolesvile, Md., will be a guest of Mrs. W. R. Davis in a few days.

Mr. Wm. D. and Miss Ellen Hoye ieft for Grantsville Monday to attend the funeral of an uncle—Mr. Ingals

The "Girls Friendly," on last Thursday gave a pic-nic party to all the children in Deer Park and vicinity, and as many of the parents and friends as chose to join them. Nearly one hundred and fifty persons were present and every one had a "good time." Carriages were engaged to take the children to the pic-nic ground, about a mile from the village, so even the tiny ones could attend. Rev. C. W. Maysilles was present and addressed the little ones very appropriately and pleasantly.

The Band of Hope have their regular meeting on Saturday night next.

Miss Addie Sherman conducted services in the M. E. Church on last Sunday evening.

Mr. Chas. Schoolman, with his daughter and son-in-law, of Philadelphia, [illegible] last week to visit his sister-in-law, Mrs. G. W. Haulenbeek.

M. Hoge, of Pennsylvania, recently made a visit to his daughter, Mrs. J. W. Laughlin.

Swanton.

Miss Ada Stank has gone to Dunbar, Pa., to vist her sister, Mrs. Shea.

Mr. Chas. T. West was on a business trip to Baltimore and Annapolis Saturday and Monday.

The Republicans of this election district are a unit in favor of the renomination of "Little Mac." We do not know of a single Republican in the district who is in favor of Mr. Wellington. Let Garrett be true to her candidate and we will have nothing to regret. This is no time to try experiments. McComas has done his duty and now men of Garrett, let us do ours. HOOSIER.

History Will Repeat Itself.

MR. EDITOR:—There are many people living, not yet among the aged, who will remember the two political campaigns of 1840 and 1844. They were the most excited and intense in the history of politics before then, or since; yet there was no violence and not much that was indecorous, but there was a great deal that partook of point, wit and good humor. Large mass-meetings were common all over the country, with able speakers who made speaking a daily occupation. The Whigs generally had the best of it in this line, but the Democrats then, as now, were good at voting.

Emblems or symbols were in great vogue, especially among the Whigs. 1840 was the beginning of log cabins, balls, hard cider, coons, fox skins, &c. One of these log cabins passed over the National road from Uniontown Penn., to Baltimore on an immense wagon. It was complete in every respect, even down to the wooden latch, and leather string hanging outside. This was a sign of welcome within. The log cabin represented General W. H. Harrison's first home at Northbend, Ohio, in contrast with the magnificent residence of his opponent. The point aimed at by hard cider was not so clear as the apple bearing orchard was not cotemporaneous with the cabin. Coons were always very numerous in new countries — have known many log cabins or houses to be almost thatched with the skins of these favorite animals. Large revolving balls were used in some instances, principally in Maryland. That most enthusiastic Whig, Thos. Shriver, of Cumberland, was the inventor. The idea was to put a political revolution in motion that was to roll on till the Democracy should be overrun and defeated, and so it was in 1840. But it is believed the idea of the ball was of Democratic thought, and came this way: In 1834 the Whig Senate passed a resolution of censure upon President Jackson for his removal of the deposits of Government money from the old U. S. Bank. Senator Thomas H. Benton, a powerful man, the brains and energy of his party, took it as almost personal to himself, and offered his celebrated expunging resolution in the Senate without consulting any human being, with this caption to his first speech, "Solitary and alone I put this ball in motion," and he kept at his ball till his resolution passed in 1837. This he considered the great triumph of his life. But it was somewhat mortifying to Clay and Calhoun, the two great antagonizers of Jackson.

The Democracy was not so prolific in emblems, but they shouted very loudly to the laboring men, "two dollars per day and roasted beef." As a faint representation of this promise I once saw a stuffed ox hide in a procession with a good Democrat astride of it, with a wooden carving knife in hand. The Democracy have always had a nack of offering shams for realities. Occasionally would be seen in Whig demonstrations a fox pelt. This was a hit at Van Buren, then President, and candidate for re-election. The origin was in a great speech of Clay, or rather philippic upon the Van Buren administration. The orator said he loved the man but detested the President. Said he could not compare him to the royal beast of the forest (lion,) but he could associate him with great propriety with another cunning little animal whose traits of character were very much disliked at all times. "Little fox," after that, was one of the designations of the courtly and urbane Van Buren. One of the many songs of the times had a stanza like this:

"At Linden wall the fox is holed,
And the coons all laugh to hear it told."

Linden wall was the beautiful home of the President.

Glee clubs were very popular in those days. They followed up the meetings and enlivened them with campaign songs which would interlude the speeches. There were great orators, and political speeches had more effect than now, but political literature was much less in quantity than at present. Chas. Ogle, of Somerset, Penn., literally spoke himself to death. He died about a year thereafter only 41 years old. His efforts certainly gave Pennsylvania to Harrison—majority only 350.

We recall a great Whig rally held in Cumberland in the summer of 1844. There was a large gathering from the surrounding country for many miles, with an industrial feature in the procession. Protection was then an important issue, but the Democracy straddled it, which they can't do in the present contest. Little Crossings, now Grantsville District, sent down most of its voting population on the Whig side. The headquarters of the delegation was in an immense wagon, drawn by 16 horses, with a bed as large as a gondola car. A beautiful arch was constructed resting upon the front and rear end of the bed or wagon, a key in the centre of the arch, a compliment to Pennsylvania. A fine ash pole was erected in the centre of the wagon, supporting the arch. The whole get up was elaborately decorated with everything calculated to lend beauty and attraction. Little crossings took the cake that day easily. But the gallant boys were greatly distressed upon being obliged to cut down their flag-staff in order to pass under some decorations that spanned Mechanic street. An amusing incident occurred in this exhibition that will bear telling. We had a live coon in a cage on the top of the arch, some 12 feet above the auditorium of the wagon. The best dressed man in the crowd was standing with his back against the pole immediately under the live symbol of Whigery. It was but a coon and new among civilization. In short it misbehaved in a manner that soiled the finest broadcloth coat and sugar-loaf hat in the club. There was a very mad Whig indeed. He then and there eschewed the dear old party, principles and all. He could not endure such an indignity, though a coon was the author. He made a moderately good Democrat for the balance of his life, but has been dead for many years.

Of those who voted at the Little Crossing in 1840 there yet remain as relics in this district the following, all above three score and ten: Sam'l Engle, Joel Beachy, John Warnick, Jonas Bittinger, Charles Lease, Israel Garlitz, Leo McKenzie, Jesse McKenzie, Amos Broadwater, William Broadwater, Charles Broadwater and Solomon Sibert—a round dozen "venerable men."

We heartily wish you well, which ever way you may vote, only let it be for your country's good.

New Ballot Boxes.

The Baltimore Sun thus describes the ballot boxes required to be used in this State by an act of the late General Assembly: "Each one to be one foot outside measure, as near as may be in width, depth and length, strapped and secured on each edge and corner with iron or brass, so as to prevent it from being easily broken, and to have a wooden lid, which shall be fastened with iron hinges and a good lock; then there is to be in the lid a slit just large enough to admit a single folded ballot at one time, and the sides of the box to be clear plate-glass, not less than an eighth of an inch in thickness."

BECAUSE.

I sit upon the mountain,
And breathe the summer air;
I sit upon the mountain
Because I have no chair.

A sweet girl sits beside me,
The reason is implied;
A sweet girl sits beside me
Because I'm by her side.

I ask her if she loves me,
The best of all her beaux;
I ask her if she loves me
Because I know she knows.

She says she will not tell me,
And, as I start to go,
She says she will not tell me
Because she knows I know.

Pray, leave us, gentle reader:
Don't hesitate or pause;
But leave us, gentle reader,
Because——well, just because.

DISEASE FROM BEASTS.

Dr. Hammond Tells of Ills That Man Takes From Animals.

Glanders and Other Diseases From Horses —Parasites Acquired From Hogs— The Cysticercus, the Tapeworm and the Trichina.

The fact that many of the diseases which affect animals are capable of being contracted by man is no longer a matter for discussion. We see evidences of its truth on all sides and we make use of the knowledge in order to protect ourselves from other diseases to which mankind is subject. Thus we take the matter engendered by the cow-pox and by inoculating ourselves with it protect ourselves from that great scourge of former days—small-pox. It is well known, too, that Pasteur asserts his ability to secure the immunity of the human subject from hydrophobia by inoculating with attenuated hydrophobia virus, but it is by no means yet proved that his efforts have in a single case been successful. The late Mr. Darwin relied upon the fact that animals are subject to many of the diseases which are met with in mankind for one of his chief arguments in favor of the identity of origin of man and those below him in the scale of creation. Thus, not only hydrophobia and small-pox, but glanders, cholera and certain skin diseases can be communicated from animals to man. In addition to these strictly contagious affections, the lower animals are subject to other diseases to which man is liable. Among these are consumption, catarrh, apoplexy, inflammation of the bowels and certain affections of the brain and spinal cord, causing convulsions, tremor and paralysis.

Among the most important diseases which we contract from the lower animals are those which are due to parasites of various kinds. As these sometimes produce fatal results and as they are all more or less preventable, I propose to restrict what I have to say at this time to the consideration of some of those diseases which are due to the presence of various organic beings which man derives from the domestic animals which minister to his wants.

Most farmers are familiar with what is called measled pork, but few persons outside of the medical profession know in what the condition really consists. The general belief is that it is a disease similar to the measles to which the human race is subject. With that disease, however, it has no analogy. A hog that is measly is inhabited, so to speak, by numerous organisms, called, in learned phraseology, cysticercus, or, in the vernacular, bladder worm, which name is due to the fact that its body consists of a vesicle which is large enough to be visible to the naked eye. This body has a comparatively long neck and a round head to which numerous hooks are attached, by means of which it can adhere to any part of the body in which it may settle. Besides the hog, it is frequently met with in sheep. The chief danger to man arising from the existence of this parasite is due to the fact of its predilection for the hog. It is destroyed by a temperature of 170 degrees Fahrenheit, and as we do not often eat our mutton without first cooking it (although mutton hams dried and smoked are sometimes taken without being cooked) we are not very liable to get these organisms into our system from this source. Certain classes of our population, however, are in the habit of eating pork which has been subjected to no more thorough cooking than such as has been afforded by the smoke house, and this is never sufficient to kill the cysticercus. As a consequence the animal obtains a lodgment in the human body and if it is content to make its way to the muscles and remain there quietly it does little or no harm. But its habits appear to be migratory, and hence it not infrequently makes excursions into the eye or the brain or other important organs, giving rise to serious symptoms and frequently causing death. It appears to have a particular liking for the brain and especially for that most important part of this organ—the gray matter. Epilepsy, acute mania, imbecility and stupor are some of the conditions which are the consequence of its presence and death usually ends the series of morbid disturbances.

A great difficulty in the way of the successful treatment of diseases caused by cysticercus is due to the fact that we have no means of recognizing their presence in the brain until we come to make a post-mortem examination, the symptoms which they produce not being distinguishable during life from those caused by the morbific factors. It has, however, been removed from the eye by a surgical operation, but we are not warranted in the present state of our knowledge in perforating the skull in a search for these animals. Prevention, however, is very easy. In the first place, the pork intended to be eaten should be carefully examined and, if even one or two cysticerci should escape observation, proper cooking would inevitably deprive them of vitality. It is by our own neglect, therefore, that they ever obtain lodgment in the human body.

Among the earliest known of human parasites the tapeworm occupies a distinguished place. Two kinds of these animals evince their predilection for man as a habitation. Both of these species have heads and long, segmented bodies, but they are not equally troublesome, for while one is armed with either two or four suckers and with a crown of small hooks by means of which it fastens itself to its dwelling place and is with difficulty dislodged, the other is unarmed and is therefore more easily gotten rid of. The head of either of these varieties is the part from which the rest of the body is developed, and therefore, if all the segments should be expelled, so long as the head remained, new segments and therefore a new body would be produced.

The history of the development of the tapeworm shows that here again were man sufficiently careful its existence within his body would be impossible, for it is generally, if not invariably, through eating flesh infested with the embryos and which is not sufficiently cooked that they make their entrance into his system. From what exact source the animals in question obtain the eggs in which the embryos are contained is not definitely known, but when they do get them into their stomachs the egg covering is broken, the embryos are set free and, not finding a congenial house, make their way at once to various parts of the body, especially the muscles or flesh. There they remain quiescent, reaching no further stage of development until they are eaten by man. Then they awaken into activity, for they now find for the first time in their existence the food which is necessary to enable them to arrive at maturity.

The armed tapeworm comes to us through the pig, while the unarmed is acquired from eating the raw or imperfectly cooked flesh of the ox. This latter is frequently introduced into the system through the grated or finely cut raw beef which is given to sick persons. It is said that in Abyssinia every person has his tapeworm, because the people of that country prefer to eat their beef in a raw state.

But of all the parasites to which man is subject the trichina is the worst and the most to be feared, for not only does it cause almost invariably the death of those so unfortunate as to be its subject, but through it the commerce of nations is to a great extent impeded. Here again the flesh of the pig is the medium through which it enters the human system, and as the American hog is either justly or unjustly regarded by European governments as being above all others liable to be infected, they unite to exclude our pork from their territories. How the trichinæ get into the hog was for a long time a matter of great doubt, but the fact appears to be now pretty well established that the pig gets them from his fondness for the flesh of the rat, in which animal these parasites abound. Where the rats get them is still unknown. Both in the rat and the hog the trichinæ remain undeveloped. They lie incysted in the flesh with a potential vitality which would never be called into action were they not introduced into the body of man. There they not only develop, but they at once become migratory and penetrate almost every organ of the body. When it is considered that a single drachm weight may contain 40,000 trichinæ embryos we may form some idea of the number that might enter the human body from even a single meal of raw or insufficiently cooked pork.

It is thus seen that it was not without reason that Moses and other lawgivers have prohibited pork as an article of food. It is not to be supposed that they knew any thing of the cysticercus, the tapeworm or the trichina, but it is quite certain that they had observed cases of disease arise from the eating of pork and they therefore very wisely made the hog what nature had already made it, an unclean animal.—William H. Hammond, in N. Y. Mail and Express.

Insects on Trees.

It is now pretty generally understood that Paris green and London purple are the cheapest and most effective poisons for such insects as gnaw the foliage. Upon such crops, however, as are nearly ready for the table, and upon insects that suck the juices of plants, as do the so-called lice or aphides, we must use some other weapon, such as the emulsion of kerosene oil or powdered hellebore or pyrothrum powder. These are all harmless, except that the hellebore occasions irritation in the eyes and nose if applied carelessly. The kerosene emulsion is probably the safest and most satisfactory insect poison of all. It is easily prepared by churning the oil in common soap suds, and can be applied by a whisk broom or syringe quickly to the leaves of vegetables. The most troublesome insects are those which feed on the under sides of the leaves, but vigorous and repeated applications of hellebore or kerosene will dispose of them.—Christian at Work.

THE COUNTY SURVEYOR.

A Being of Remarkable Importance and Royal Self-Possession.

Those of my dear readers who can read [and I suppose, without a doubt, that a good many of them can] will, with little difficulty, recall the awe in which the magicians of the olden time were held by their fellow mortals. This awe and veneration has a parallel in modern life in the general respect and consideration with which the county surveyor is treated on the occasion of a professional visit to one of the hemlats in his territory.

Enoch Jimson and Solon McGill got into a wrangle over a new line fence that must be built, each wanting to shove it over toward his neighbor a little. Although the land in dispute amounted to but little, they could reach no settlement of the difficulty without the lines being "run." So the county surveyor is called in, and it is then that his importance is manifested and his vanity gets a wholesale tickling.

Augustus Bings is not a man you would pick out in a crowd as being one to whom the world at large would look up with any remarkable degree of veneration; nor does he seem to expect it, as he walks among his fellow men in the populous county seat. But when he reaches the little town of Tylerville his dignity and importance have grown to enormous proportions. Possibly it is the ozone of the country air that has so remarkable an effect.

On this trip he is accompanied by a youth who carries the chain and holds the rod with intention of ultimately learning the mysteries of the profession, and at last shining forth himself. This youth is the cynosure of all eyes, as far as the juvenile portion of the village is concerned, and is envied as being the happy possessor of enormous brain qualifications, thus to enable him to act in the important capacity in which he does. All the slang phrases which he drops are eagerly snapped up by his young admirers, and the chestnuts that he incidentally relates pass current as the latest and best wit for many a day.

It is only the assistant that jests, however. The surveyor himself is self-contained, and scorns such frivolities, as being unseemly in a man so far advanced in science as he is. His utterances are brief and sententious, and confined mostly to sundry and dark hints as to the capacity of the individual who run the lines before.

Deliberation and lack of hurry are marked characteristics of our surveyor on these trips, and it being so near noon he does not undertake his work until he has refreshed himself with dinner. The smiling and gracious landlord escorts his guests to their seats; the cook holds the kitchen door open a crack and inserts a tousled head to steal a glance at the great man; the young lady that waits on the table adjusts her bangs and looks pleased; the assistant; the regular boarders file in and seat themselves and turn their conversation to as important subjects as possible so as not to be considered too ostentatiously flippant.

Dinner over, our surveyor and his assistant are rejoined by the contending parties and an augmented audience. They proceed to the seat of war; the assistant spreads the three sticks so they will stand alone; the surveyor motions the boy who carried the box to come forward. He steps forth with his precious burden with the proud step of a soldier called from the ranks to receive a decoration for bravery. The eyes of the public are turned toward the box, each eager to catch the first glimpse of its contents. The surveyor takes a key from his pocket, stoops down and deliberately opens the cover. A stillness falls upon the group, as he lifts from its resting place the transit and puts it in position on the tripod. Each move he makes locating, leveling and all the various maneuverings are watched carefully, and no motion escapes notice. His assistant walks away from the instrument, bearing the figured rod and pulling the wire chain. He pauses at a certain distance; holds up the rod; the surveyor places his eye to the instrument and waves his hand to the right; the assistant moves the rod to the right; he waves his arm again; the assistant moves again; he gazes long and earnestly, then stands erect and the surveyor produces a little red book in which he makes a few figures. He stops to talk with Jimson and then with McGill. The postmaster sidles up, holds one eye shut with his finger, squints into the instrument with the other and sees—nothing. The cobbler, the next best politician, who is also deacon in the church and school committeeman, follows the postmaster with the same success. One or two more of the more influential and important inhabitants do the same, while the new doctor, who once carried chain during vacation to earn money to pursue his studies, asks the surveyor "if his vernier reads to the fractions of seconds," which so booms his reputation for learning, that old Doctor Bolus loses three patients during the next week, who transfer their support to the new doctor "who is up to the times."

At length the survey is made, and the matter decided in favor of neither, for the old fence was in the right place, and the two contestants become friendly once more. The surveyor and his assistant leave on the evening train, and the village settles back into its accustomed tranquillity, but for some time to come, the record of an event is based on the number of days or weeks that it happened before or after "that there surveyor was out to Jimson's."—Anthony Alps, in Texas Siftings.

OPENING AN ACCOUNT.

The Trouble a Savings Bank Fellow Had with a Depositor.

The officials require not only nimble fingers and active brains to deal with all these dollars, and all these anxious, nervous people, but they require a great deal of patience as well; for, in their busiest moments, they are often pestered with patrons like the irritable and suspicious woman, who, after fidgeting for half an hour in the line, at length reaches the teller's window and seems inclined to stay there.

"I've got ten dollars," says she, "and I want to open an account."

"With pleasure, madam. What is your name?"

"Simpkins."

"Christian name, please?"

"Sophronisba."

"Any middle name?"

"Katherine."

"What is your age, please?"

"That's none of your business."

"Pardon me, madam, it is the rule of the bank to make these inquiries. I can not go on without this information. It is as necessary for your own protection as it is for ours."

"Thirty-five, then."

"Are you married or single?"

"Now, look here, mister, you are impertinent. Do I look married? I'd like to see the man who'd marry me, if he dared."

"Shall I write married or single? Be quick as you can, please."

"Single, then. And as I said, if you think——"

"Residence?"

"Right here in the city."

"Quite so, but the street and number, please."

"That's nothing to do with it. I don't want you to call, and if you dare to send a policeman to see——"

"What is the street and number?"

"Thirteen —— place. But I never saw any thing like this in all my born——"

"Where were you born?"

"Same place, if you want to know."

"Have you any occupation?"

"Now, see here! I suppose you want to know where I got this money. But I didn't steal it, if that's any satisfaction to you. Of course, I——"

"What did you say your occupation is?"

"I didn't say; you didn't give me a chance. I keep the best boarding-house in the town; meals three times a day, and——"

"Please sign your name on this line."

"Sign my name? Don't you believe me? I never sign any thing, only——"

"Very well, if you can't write make your cross."

"Make me cross? That's just it; you make me so cross I can't write. Sophonisba Katherine Simpkins. There!"

"That will do. Kindly make way for the next person."

"O, but mister, say, look here! What, have you got it?"

"Got what?"

"The age."

"Thirty-five."

"Does it make any difference if it ain't right?"

"It might make a serious difference."

"O, dear! O, dear! I've gone and perjured myself. But it's all your fault, you horrid man, you flustered me so. Did I say thirty-five? I didn't mean it. It's forty-five, so there!"

And way she goes in a state of great indignation and perplexity.—Boston Herald.

HOT WEATHER TALK.

Dr. Cyrus Edson Tells What to Wear and Drink in Summer.

It is best to wear dark clothing in the summer. The black absorbs heat when it is in the sun's rays. On the other hand, the heat will pass out through the black textures rapidly, so that the radiation of the heat from the body would be much freer in a person clothed in black than white. This statement is forcibly illustrated by the white coats of animals who live in the arctic regions. They are clothed that way for the reason that the color holds the bodily heat, and does not allow it to radiate as rapidly as black. Thin flannel shirts are good for summer wear, and it is best to wear them next to the skin.

Lemonade is a good drink for hot weather, but taken in excess it has a scorbutic effect. The best and the most wholesome summer drink is cold water. It should be freely used, and should be cooled by keeping it on the ice, and not by putting the ice in it. A few bottles placed in the refrigerator every morning would be sufficient to supply the family during the day. An excellent practice for those in cities, where soda-water fountains are numerous, is to occasionally make use of that beverage. Soda taken when thirst calls for it is healthful and refreshing. The flavored sirups sold at these fountains should never be taken in hot weather, as they are very heating.—Dr. Cyrus Edson, in Epoch.

Money Not a Criterion.

Frugal young man (to object of his affections)—Darling, your father being a minister, perhaps we'd better ask him to perform the ceremony for us. He would do it as reas—in fact, I presume he would think it an insult if I should offer him anything—er——

Object of his affections—I don't know. I have often heard papa say that he could always tell by the size of the fee what kind of an estimate the bridegroom put upon the bride.

Frugal young man (uneasily)—H'm! Money couldn't express it my case, darling. All the wealth of the world couldn't do it! But I've got a second cousin, a justice of the peace, that will marry us for two dollars.—Chicago Tribune.

TEMPERANCE READING.

ALCOHOLIC TRANCE.

What Men Do When Under the Influence of Liquor—When Drunk the Person Is a Mental Waif, Without Compass or Chart.

In somnambulism the person may go about, and do many intricate acts, without consciousness or any recollections of them afterward. In epilepsy, distinct periods of consciousness occur. Acts unusual and often violent follow, which are never remembered. In mania these memory blanks are common, and the person is an automaton, acting without any conscious influence of the present. These are familiar illustrations of some unknown pathological and physchological states of the brain, in which memory is suspended or cut off, and the operations of the mind go on without realization of the surroundings or the influence of experience. This is some obscure form of psychological palsy, in which the person had no recollection of his acts during this time. From the many clinical studies of cases which have been made, the following general conclusions seem to be sustained.

First, alcoholic trance is not an unusual condition of inebriety. The victim is literally an automaton, and acts without memory or consciousness of passing events—a state which may last from a few minutes to several days. Second, it is distinct from epilepsy, hysteria or any known forms of mania, and is found associated with some unknown condition following alcoholic poisoning, continuously or at intervals. Third, this condition is probably one of brain exhaustion, followed by a lowering of consciousness till events are no longer clearly remembered; or a suspension of nerve force in certain directions, closely allied to paralysis of certain brain functions; hence there are profound disturbances of brain-centers, and impaired and lessened responsibility.

One group of trance cases seems never to do any thing outside a natural, accustomed order of every-day life. Thus, a farmer in this state goes on with his regular work. A physician continues to visit his patients, and a railroad conductor attends to all his usual duties, without any memory of these states. A second group of trance cases seems prominent by unusual acts and thoughts. Thus, a banker in this State left his regular work and went round delivering tracts in the lower part of the city. A quiet, retiring man became vociferous, bold and aggressive. A peaceful man was combative, a truthful man untruthful, and a conscientious, religious man was treacherous and skeptical. Later, these events were perfect blanks in their memory. In a third group of trance cases, some unusual line of conduct seems to grow out of the surroundings unexpectedly, or some old buried thought or conception comes to the surface. Thus, a clergyman insists on riding with the engineer on the engine. A skeptical physician takes part in a prayer-meeting. A merchant goes round threatening to kill an old school-master who punished him in boyhood. A wealthy man has a new will written, disposing of his property differently every time. In the last two groups criminal cases occur most frequently, although some very remarkable instances have been reported under the first group.

In a little work entitled "Alcoholic Somnambulism," Prof. Jerusky, of St. Petersburg, mentions the case of a chief of police, who was an inebriate, ordering the arrest and execution of two suspected Jews. His orders were carried out in form, but not in reality. A day later he recovered from the trance state, and had no recollection of the past; he had total amnesia of this act. Another case is cited of an officer who ordered a house burned down on the supposition that its inmates were preparing to destroy his command. Two days later he awoke with no memory of this event, and could give no reason for the act. In these cases the somnambulistic act was along the line of his usual work, and performed without the slightest consciousness of its nature and consequences.

The criminal trance may be divided into two classes, one of which seems to have no history of criminality previous to the commission of the crime. They are inebriates of active neurotic temperament, who have occupied reputable stations in life, and belong to the better classes. All crime is unusual with them, and apparently grows out of alcoholic poisoning. The second class are the low neurotics and defectives by birth and education. They have a history of irregularities of life and conduct that seems to prepare the way for criminal acts, and probably are more subject to the trance state because of defective heredity.

Clinical facts indicate that in all cases of inebriety there is a defective brain-power and general perversion of healthy activity; also, the door is open for many varied nerve changes and degrees of brain instability, which always give a doubt to the sanity of the victim. The fact of being an inebriate points to an unsound mind, and more or less incapacity to act or think normally. When the trance state is determined the actual responsibility or cognizance of right or wrong is suspended—the person is a mental waif, without compass or chart. No evidence of premeditation or apparent judgment in his actions can change this fact. Any special act may spring from some impression laid up in the past which, when conscious reason is withdrawn, takes on form and semblance. The real condition of the mind is always more or less concealed. Where the case is a periodical inebriate with distinct free intervals of sanity, a possibility of concealed or masked epilepsy should always be considered. Epilepsy is likely to be present or to follow from some organic tendency or favoring conditions. When this defense of no memory of the act is made the case should receive a thorough medical study before any conclusion of responsibility can be reached.—Science.

WOMEN AND THE SALOON.

The Direst Enemy of Domestic Happiness, Purity and Peace.

Yet, though the saloon brutalizes and degrades men, and increases the friction of all progressive effort immensely, the suffering which it entails upon women is heavier and keener. The maternal grief involved is but one phase of the subject. If the saloon wrecks thousands of lives and homes, its victims go to ruin with paralyzed sensibilities; and when they are inflicting most pain upon those who love them, they are at least capable of realizing the truth. The liquor, whose habitual use dulls all the faculties, extinguishes conscience, shame and self-respect in the course of its destructive work, and the hardened drinker will sacrifice every thing to his master passion without scruple or hesitation; but the women who are doomed to bear the heavy burden of relationship to drunkards are indeed to be pitied. The domesticity from which few of them can escape forces upon them perpetual experiences so heart-breaking, so revolting, that their existence is a prolonged tragedy. All the caprice, petulance, unreason, tyranny, brutality engendered by drink is expended upon them. All the social degradation and mortification of the position falls upon their heads. The living man chained to a corpse is not more terribly situated than the wives and daughters of the saloon's victims. Liquor eliminates all the drunkard's good qualities, reinforces all his worst vices, and, having thus transformed him, sends him home to torture and abuse those whom it is his first duty to cherish and protect. At the sacrifice of her future happiness, the wife may sometimes obtain a divorce; very often, however, her inability to support herself compels her to endure her torment, or the reluctance to expose her children to reproach constrains her to bear every thing. It is seldom that women are so situated as to be able to resume a celibate life without submitting to serious hardships, and perhaps in a majority of instances they can secure a separation only by facing destitution.

There is no evil which operates so directly, and with such disastrous potency, against the family as the saloon. In fact, it is the direct enemy of domestic happiness, purity, and peace. Even in its mildest manifestations it alienates men from their homes; creates in them habits of selfish indulgence; gives them sensual interests apart; brings into competition with the innocent recreations of the home circle, coarse, vulgar and extravagant amusements. In its more pronounced operations, it stops at no such trifles as the production of mere discomfort, but, proceeding without disguise, turns men into wild beasts and then lets them loose upon their families. What makes this especially shocking is that we are all acquainted with its truth, yet that we have hitherto tolerated it passively. The horrors to which drink exposes women are worse than those of slavery. The sufferings of the wives and daughters of drinking men are more acute and constant than most men are probably capable of experiencing. We all know this, yet we go on calmly in the old way, as if we either thought women ought to be thus abused, or believed that, though the matter was pitiful, no help could be found for it. Much has been written of late years about the alleged quickening of sensibility, the enlargement of humanitarian tendencies, the revolt against cruelty in all its manifestations. Is there not danger of the moral atrophy engendered by self-conceit, where illusions so flattering can co-exist with the natural life we are living? Familiarity with evil must have blinded us alarmingly when we can seriously believe that we have reached a real height of reform; that we have attained a stage of civilization pure enough to be proud of; that there is no special need for concern because of the sins that do most easily beset us.—Atlantic.

TEMPERANCE ITEMS.

According to the Quarterly Journal of Inebriety the medicinal value of alcohol is slowly vanishing.

A French scientist, after thorough investigation, comes to the conclusion that the increase in crime is in a large measure due to the use of alcoholic drinks.

Let tobacco and liquors alone, and you may not be so popular with bummers, but you will live longer, learn more, and be better off in this life and the next.—Advance Thought.

The money spent for drink in an American city of 200,000 inhabitants is put down at $25,000 per week the year round. That is $1,300,000 thrown away and worse, and seven-tenths of it comes from day laborers.

The British National Temperance Society has, somewhat awkwardly, been made the legatee for $1,200 by the will of a deceased wine merchant, the money to be given as prizes for the best three essays on total abstinence.

KNOWING HOW.

"First select the proper thread—
  Forty-five will do;
Be careful of the tension,
  Then put down the 'shoe,'
If you want to hem or fell"—
  It looks real hard, I vow;
But I guess it's easy,
  When a girl knows how!

"Take half a cup of sugar,
  And a bowl of flour;
Two eggs, then spice to suit,
  And bake it for an hour.
Then if you wish to ice it"—
  It sounds real hard, I vow;
But I guess it's easy,
  When a girl knows how!

"A pair of woolen mittens
  To suit a little girl;
Knit two, drop one, knit three,
  Then narrow, loop and purl;
Take up the stitch, turn o'er twice"—
  It sounds real hard, I vow,
But no doubt it's easy,
  When a girl knows how!

I'll watch mamma as she works,
  I'll help her every day;
Much can be learned, I know,
  In such a quiet way.
I'll sew, and bake, and knit—
  'Twill not seem hard, I vow,
For don't you see, then I will be
  The girl who knows just how!

A CURIOUS HOUSE.

How the Lead Gets into the Pencil—A Short But Busy Journey.

I know a curious house with two doors. Into one door go cedar logs and barrels of graphite, and out of the other comes an endless procession of beautiful pencils, red and black, round and cornered, big and little, some with caps of ivory or rubber, and some with none.

It isn't a very long journey through that house, but it's a very busy one. Let us go in. The first room is the blackest you ever saw; it looks as if the whole thing had been dipped into ink, and if you touch the tip of your finger anywhere you'll be marked. There are two long rows of big tanks in which graphite and clay are being washed and cleaned, and there are pans of blackness itself, and there's a large tub with a wheel running around in it. This persevering wheel is simply mixing together the two substances, for graphite alone is too soft to use; it must be joined with clay, the more clay the harder the pencil.

But there's an interesting thing going on even in this black hole. Out of a small machine comes all the time a soft black string, and falls on a board in a queer-looking pile. This is a press; into the top is poured the thick, tough paste that comes out of the mixing tub, and, being squeezed more than it can bear, it is pushed out a small square hole in the bottom. When the board is full of yards and yards of the tangled-looking stuff, it goes into the hands of a boy, who was white once—though you wouldn't think it, so covered are face and hands with the black of the leads he works with.

The business of this youth is to straighten the leads, and he does it by laying the soft string across a board three or four times as long as a pencil, pushing it up evenly against the raised edge, and cutting it off. Length after length he thus lays straight, and when the board is full it goes into a very hot room to dry.

May be you think the leads are now ready to take up their residence in their cedar houses; but they must go through another process, or they would crumble as fast as we sharpened the pencil. When dry they are cut into pencil lengths, packed tightly into cases and baked. Now they are ready to use.

While all this has been happening to the lead a home has been prepared for it to live in. Pencil houses are made in blocks, like city houses, always six in a row. When the cedar comes into the room it is in the shape of little boards, somewhat longer than a pencil, and as wide as six pencils side by side. Half of the boards are nearly as thick as a pencil and the other half very thin—for roofs, as you will see. First the thicker boards go through a machine that plows six little square grooves in them, and now at last both cedar and lead are ready to be joined for life, to wear out in useful work together.

This happens in a most disagreeable room, strong with the odor of glue, and at the hands of sticky, dreadful-looking girls and boys. The first girl daubs one of the clean, sweet-smelling cedar boards with hot glue, and pushes it along to the next. This girl takes in one hand some leads, spreads them out like a fan, and presses six of them into the six little grooves, where they fit perfectly. Then she pushes it back to the first girl, who slaps on the roof in a second, before the glue has time to cool. Now it goes to a boy who packs it on top of a pile in an iron frame, where it is screwd down to prevent it from warping. After another rest in the drying-room, the ends are sawed off square, and they are ready to go downstairs.

They go by themselves; that is, they are placed one by one in the top of a case that reaches to the floor below, to the very jaws of a machine. As one of these blocks touches the bottom of the long case, a finger of steel comes up and pushes it forward, between two sets of small knives, and it comes out the other side cut into six nice round pencils.

They are now perfect for use, but they have to be smoothed to fit them for polite society. They are polished in a droll way. A man stands before an endless belt full of notches, and feeds it a pencil to a notch all the time. The belt is moving slowly along, and the next moment the pencil passes under four wooden hands with gloves of emery, which polish it off as if they liked the fun, while the pencils rattle but can not get away, and in a second or two drop, all warm and shining, into a basket below.

If one were satisfied with plain cedar pencils, they would now be done; but fashion says they must be black or red. So into big barrels go thousands at a time, together with the red or black coloring matter that is to paint them. There the steam-power shakes them back and forth, and over and over, with a great rattle and clatter, till every pencil has its colored coat.

Now comes the last machine, and in the factory I speak of, near New York, it is a marvelous affair. At the beginning is a full box of pencils, which drop one at a time on the bed of the machine. From here it is instantly pushed through a cup of varnish, and comes out wet on the other side. At once it falls on to an endless open belt, which carries it slowly through a hot-air box that dries it on the way. At one point each pencil is registered, and when ten gross have gone through something drops that strikes a bell and stops the machine. A man comes, takes away the ten gross, and starts up the machine again.

The gilt lettering and putting into packages of one dozen are at present done by hand, but I dare say by the time you are grown up a machine will be contrived to do the whole thing itself.—Olive Thorne Miller, in Christian Union.

BOYS WHO SUCCEED.

The Difference Between Jim and Joe—What One Did, and the Other Did Not Accomplish.

Of two boys with the same advantages and equally good training, one will succeed in life, while the other, without being bad, "never amounts to any thing," as the saying goes. Perhaps the following anecdote will explain something of the disparity in results.

A nurseryman left home for a few days on a business trip. It was rainy weather, and not a season for sales, but a customer did arrive from a distance, tied up his horse, and went into the kitchen, where two boys were cracking nuts.

"Is Mr. Barnes at home?" he asked.

"No," said Joe, the eldest, hammering at a nut.

"When will he be back?"

"Dunno. Mebbe not for a week."

The youngest boy, Jim, promptly jumped up and followed the irritated stranger out of doors.

"The men are not here," he said, in a bright and courteous manner, "but I can show you the stock."

The stranger was conciliated, and followed Jim through the nursery, examining the trees, and left his order.

"You have sold the largest bill of the season, Jim," said his father, greatly pleased, on his return.

A few years afterward, these two boys were left by their father's death with but three hundred dollars apiece. Joe bought an acre or two near home, and, although he worked hard, he is still a poor, discontented man.

Jim bought an emigrant's ticket to Colorado, hired out as a cattle-driver for a couple of years, and with his wages bought land at $1.25 an acre, built himself a house and married. To-day his herds are numbered by the thousand, his land has been cut up in town lots, and he is one of the wealthy men of the Centennial State.

"I might have done like Jim," said Joe, resentfully, "if I'd only thought in time. There's as good stuff in me as him."

Joe was right. He had the same stuff in him, but it was not developed. The quick, wide-awake energy which causes a boy to act promptly and boldly in an emergency is partly natural, but it can be inculcated by parents, and it is worth more than any gift of nature.—Golden Days.

Writing on the Ice.

Not many of you, my children, will care to write your letters on ice, even during the summer months. But I was rather struck with the novel idea, when a boy of the Red School-house told the dear Little School-ma'am a bit of news that lately had come to this country from Austria. It appears that Francis Joseph, the Emperor of Austria, has a country-seat near Vienna, and on this fine royal estate is a lake which in winter is used as a skating pond. Well, during one of the latest Austrian "cold snaps," an expert Vienna gentleman went skating there, with a little reservoir of ink adjusted to the back of his skate in such a way as to allow the ink to flow out in a fine, steady stream. Then off he started, and before he had skated long, there appeared in his rapid track the name of the Crown Princess, beautifully and plainly written upon the ice.—St. Nicholas.

—A certain citizen in a far West town possessed the only tree in the place, with a large, strong limb at the proper distance from the ground, which he was in the habit of renting out to lynching parties at five dollars per meeting. The advent of the Western Union Telegraph Company, with their long telegraph poles, ruined the industry completely and destroyed a valuable source of income to the owner of the tree.

—Salutations in Japan are something remarkable, and are thus described by a correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle: "The men of Japan are always excessively polite to one another. They bend their backs and bow their heads, and put their two hands back to back between their knees and have a great time. But the most amusing thing is to see two old ladies in Japan meeting one another on the street. They catch sight of one another three or four blocks apart. They immediately begin to make obeisance to one another, and they keep bending and bowing at short intervals until they come together, when they make a peculiar hiss by drawing in the breath and keep on saying 'Ohavo' for about two minutes."

—A fish of the sturgeon variety about eighteen inches in length was recently given to the superintendent of an ice factory in Parkersburg, W. Va. It was placed in one of the ice molds and frozen in the center of a huge cube of ice. This block of ice was put in a public place, where the citizens could view the fish, frozen hard and fast in the center of the cake. The ice began to melt and it dwindled until the body of the fish was exposed to the air while the head was still firmly imbedded in the ice. The tail of the fish was seen to move slightly, as the hot sun poured its rays upon it. Attention being called to the fact, the head was carefully released from its icy prison and the sturgeon placed in a tank of water. It recovered completely in a few minutes, and was apparently as sound as ever.

CONCERNING FAULTS.

Whatever May Be Their Cause There Is No Merit in Them.

It is difficult to define exactly what we mean by a fault. There is a popular impression, which is nearly correct, that it is something irregular, but that it lacks in magnitude or intent something of that which goes to constitute a positive sin. In many instances faults are simply irregularities in execution, or mere inattentions, negations, and almost always have the quality of being incidental; not intentional, not purposed, nor the result of passion.

There are a great many who suppose that there is a merit in faults. We think they do not discriminate very wisely. It is true that perfect people are the most disagreeable and intolerable people in the world—those so-called perfect men that, in order not to speak wrong, never speak at all, and, in order not to do wrong, do nothing; those cold, precise, inelastic, hard, smooth, polished people, that are regarded as perfect—by themselves. It is true that when you are in contact with such people you hunger and thirst for some roughness, and wish they would break out somehow and seem to be human.

There is an impression derived from excess in that direction that faults are signs of a fertile nature; like the bark on wholesome trees; like gnarls and knots on the oak; and people say that they would not want a man to have fewer faults, because they give a kind of robustness to character.

Now, there may be certain kinds of faults of which this is true—faults of manner, faults of irregularity—but this ought not to blind us to the moral character and to the effects of faults that involve principle, that touch the question of benevolence and selfishness, that run their roots even deeper and touch the very seat of honor and character.—*N. VALUE OF DIAMONDS.

How the Price of Pure Stones is Maintained by a Monopoly.

"When I was in London a short time ago," said Mr. D. De S. Mendes, the diamond cutter, "I was allowed as special favor to see the great diamond that was found last year in South Africa. I think they are going to call it the Jubilee diamond, but I believe it is not yet named. It is the whitest stone in the world, and one of the largest, and is owned by eight persons on shares, the value being greater than any one even of the enormously rich diamond dealers could afford.

"When found it was of an irregular shape, being somewhat like an egg with the small end somewhat elongated. The owners, in order to reduce it to a regular shape, split off this end, and after cutting the fragment found they had a forty-karat brilliant, which they sold to the King of Portugal for £40,000. The value of the remainder was not impaired by the subtraction of this trifle, but rather enhanced, since the split was successful, and the shape of the stone is improved. It is valued by the owners at £1,500,000, and any gentleman who wishes to invest in a rather costly trifle can not do better than examine it.

"The owners intend keeping it until the Prince of Wales shall succeed to the throne of England, and then trying to sell it to him. Failing this sale, it is hard to tell what they can do with it."

"Who are the owners now?" was asked of Mr. Mendes.

"I do not think I'd better mention names," he replied, with the caution which a dealer in diamonds must needs have. "There is considerable mystery maintained about it, and it would not perhaps be safe to tell all the facts, even if I knew them, about when the stone was found, who bought it and what they paid. I know that there is such a stone, however, for I have seen it, and I know it is owned in eight shares, for the gentleman who showed it to me owns one-eighth.

"It is difficult for people outside the business to realize the enormous wealth of the diamond dealers in London," he continued. "As an indication, I may say that the same gentleman showed me one package of stones aggregating 5,000 carats, which he valued at five guineas a carat. This was by no means his stock in trade. It was one of a number of packages."

"He is one of the shareholders in the two great companies which practically control the diamond market of the world. They are the Central Diamond Mining Company, and the Kimberley Diamond Mining Company. Between the two, they own or control every important claim in the world in which diamonds are found. These are in Africa, for, as is well known, the supply from the old mines has entirely ceased. The two companies control hundreds of millions of capital, and were formed by a consolidation of all the small companies owning claims, for the purpose of controlling the output, and so keeping up the value of diamonds."

"Is the value then fluctuating?"

"It has fluctuated considerably within a few years. The scare or flurry in the trade that was talked about after the African mines were discovered, and which was pooh-poohed by the bulls, was a very active reality, and was very nearly approaching a panic when the consolidation was effected. The large dealers saw plainly that unless something was done to limit the supply the market would be broken, and they banded together and bought a control of all the diamond mines. Since that time no new diamonds have been put on the market, excepting those which they have allowed, and the price, which had gone down, has been restored to about what it had been for many years."

"Then the price or value of diamonds no longer depends upon their natural supply, but upon an artificial restriction of it."

"Precisely so."

"And it is within the power of these two companies to break the market whenever they choose."

"Undoubtedly, but they will never do it, for they would be throwing away millions of pounds of their own property."—N. Y. Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Russian Book Collectors.

It will be news to half the world that the Russian nobles are sedulous collectors of books and manuscripts. Prince Woronzoff, for instance, has a library of 12,000 volumes at St. Petersburg, and possesses another equally large at Alupka. The Princess Lunog's library contains nearly 13,000 books, most of which were collected by her father, Bibikoff. In Slavonic literature it is especially rich, and it contains about 600 works in various languages on numismatics. The late Minister of Justice, Count Panin had a library of 11,000 volumes which was remarkable for an encyclopædic series of works relating to the legislation of the different European States. He had also considerable libraries in the Crimea and at Marsino, near Moscow. The library of Count Scheremetjeff, the foundations of which were laid by the conqueror of Livonia, contains 25,000 volumes, many incunabula, and a perfect treasury of ecclesiastical music. The present owner has himself increased his great literary heritage by the addition of 12,000 volumes. He has been a diligent collector of books bearing upon Russian and Slavonic history and topography.—Pall Mall Gazette.

WESTERN DUGOUTS.

The Houses of Early Homestead Claimants in Kansas and Nebraska.

To begin with, the habitation of the homesteader is either a dugout or a house built of squares of sod taken from the prairie—Nebraska or Kansas brick, as they are facetiously termed. The dugout consists of a hole dug in the side of a canyon or any sort of depression on the prairie which will serve as a wind-break. This hole is roofed across, about on a level with the prairie with inch boards, and these are covered with sod. A foot or so of stove-pipe protruding from the roof is the sole indication of a human habitation. One room generally serves all the purposes of the homesteader and his family. If he prospers for a season, he adds to the front of his abode by erecting walls of sod on the sides and putting in a new front, the old one serving as a partition between the two rooms. This is considered a commodious dwelling. After riding over the quarter section looking for an owner, espying such an abode, and guiding your team carefully down a break-neck descent to the front door, would it surprise you, upon entering this hole in the ground, to find, for instance, a very modern organ with an imposing cathedral back towering high in one corner of the room? But this is no cause for astonishment—very frequently organs and ornate designs in furniture are to be found in the dugouts. Or, if the lady of the house should invite you to remain for the meeting of the literary club there in the evening, would you stare at that? Not at all. Literary clubs, which the members ride all the way from five to twenty miles to attend, and where they discuss with great earnestness every thing from the latest political problem to the most abstruse point in metaphysics, are quite the regular thing with our homesteaders. But to behold this life so full of paradoxes in the height of its incongruousness you should be a spectator in the dugout when a neighborhood dance is in full blast. The earthen walls have been skilfully tapestried for the occasion with calico, and when the fun begins, the clay floor speedily responds to the capering of the many twinkling feet, and there arises a cloud of dust that would stifle an Indian. But, bless you! they don't mind a bit of dust. A polished floor and most perfect system of ventilation attainable could add nothing to their enjoyment.

The homesteaders are very honest. You can leave a house unlocked at all times and your stores are perfectly safe—with the exception of what liquor you may have on hand for medicinal purposes. In other words, the homesteader will steal whisky every time. As a class they are neighborly, kind to one in distress, and exceedingly hospitable.

But it must not be supposed that all homesteaders live in dugouts or sleep six or seven in a room; such experiences attach to the first year or two of frontier life more than to any later period. Many sightly, commodious and comfortable sod houses have been built. The walls are usually two feet in thickness, the roof shingled, doors and windows set into the walls, and the house plastered inside, sometimes outside, altogether making a very neat and desirable residence. These structures, too, are free from the annoyances of dugouts, in which are found all manner of insects and rodents. Occasionally a rattlesnake will burrow through the earthen sides and coil himself snugly in the bed-clothes, where you will find him on a cold morning. Such intruders are rare, but there are some people who strenuously object to even rare visits of this sort; such are usually energetic enough to get out of the old house and into a new one before spending many months in an abode so uncomfortably near to nature's heart.—Frank H. Spearman, in Harper's Magazine.

ADVICE TO BATHERS.

A Few Suggestions Concerning When and How to Bathe.

Bathers should enter the water swiftly, not allowing the lower limbs to become chilled, thus driving the blood to the head. Most of our boys plunge into the water head foremost; but this is not necessary. To submerge the body up to the neck is enough. After this the body resumes an even temperature, and when this course is followed injurious results are rare.

The common belief that it is necessary to wet the head upon entering the water is based upon the assumption that otherwise too much blood is impelled upward. This is not true if the rest of the body is quickly immersed. Ladies can not be expected to soak their hair every time they bathe, nor is it necessary that they should do so.

A common error is that of remaining in the water too long. Blue lips, shivering limbs and subsequent headaches should be sufficient warning. A nap after bathing is advised by physicians. Sea bathing induces drowsiness, and has the effect of a sedative and nerve tonic; hence a dip in the salt water just before retiring for the night generally insures sound sleep. When the water is colder than usual postpone the bath. Because some robust people can bathe in and out of season, and stay in longer than others, should not induce sensible people to imitate them. Fifteen minutes is quite long enough to remain in the water under ordinary circumstances, and for delicate persons even that short space of time may be injurious. Too violent exercise in the water should be avoided. The extreme fatigue which follows is in itself sufficient evidence that it is injurious.—Dr. Bailey, in People's Health Journal.

SCIENCE OF NAMES.

A System Submitted for the Benefit of Fathers and Mothers.

Writers spend much time and thought in selecting a name for a play or novel, for they know that success is largely dependent on it. Parents, however, are strangely careless and unscientific in giving names to children. Usually, when a new-comer arrives, some old family name is taken, or if the parents exercise an original choice, they are too much excited to be guided by any sound euphonic principles. They forget that not only from the social point of view it is very advantageous to have one's name remembered, but that from the business point of view notoriety is capital, and must be obtained by persistent and ingenious advertising. The economy of the public stock of energy wasted in innumerable unconscious efforts to remember a name without any corners for the memory to grasp, but persistently thrust before it, would result in an increase of available mental force applicable to settling the question of future probation, or to raising the ethical standard, or to reforming the tariff, or to disposing of the surplus. The importance of the subject leads me to suggest one or two of the chief fundamental principles of the science of naming children. The system is simple, and any provident parent can easily master and apply it.

1. Avoid odd, or eccentric, or poetic combinations, and be guided by euphonic quality only. It is true that an odd name may be remembered, but the associations with it will not be pleasing. The idea of oddity or affectation may attach to the shadowy personality built up in the mind of the public. Under this rule hyphenated names, especially hyphenated Christian names like Floyd-Jones Robinson, are to be avoided. Writing the first given name with an initial and the second in full is also evidently opposed to correct scientific principles.

2. The best form of name is a dactyl and a spondee, like "Jeremy Taylor." Every one has heard of the "Shakespeare of divines," and has a dim idea of an agreeable personality attached to the name. Had his name been Charles Taylor, it is far within bounds to say that his reputation would be about one-third of what it is now.

3. If the surname is not one that can be treated according to the above rule, it should be fitted with a given name, such as to bring the combination as nearly as possible to the above length and cadence, as, Sidney Dobell, Ellery Vans, Henry Ward Beecher, Dante Rossetti, Theodore Watts, and the like; or, otherwise, to two long syllables, like Mark Twain or Bret Harte. The subdivision of this branch of the subject are too numerous to be given, but all rest on principle No. 2. The phonic value of the surname is, under our custom, the controlling element in practically applying the science of names.

The great value of names beginning with Mac or O is evident, because they so readily combine with the ordinary Christian names. Any one would be favorably disposed to Arthur O'Connor, for instance. A boy pervades our quiet neighborhood simply because his name is Johnny MacWhorter. He is not in any respect a remarkable boy, but his name forces him into prominence by its phonic value. There are some ten or twelve boys who are comrades, but he and another dactyl-spondee boy, Emory Watson, are the only ones ever spoken of. No doubt there are others who do as much mischief and make more noise, but these two reap all the fame.—Atlantic.

GREEK DANCING GIRLS.

Their Artistic Attire and Graceful Motions Graphically Described.

In the middle of the square was a ring or coil of maidens, the eldest perhaps twenty years of age, the youngest hardly more than five years old. No two were dressed exactly alike, yet there was a general similarity in style. All wore long white skirts, some of delicate materials and others of heavy stuff. The overskirt, reaching to the knee, was dark and full, hanging in many folds. A broad belt of silk hung below the waist. An elaborate apron of great variety of color and decoration, reached nearly to the ankles. Each maiden wore a close-fitting vest, generally of red, bright blue, or gilt. This was cut low and round in front, and served as stays. Over the upper part of the breast hung a little stomacher, on which were strung jingling gold and silver coins, the girl's chief dowry. Over and around the head (sometimes covering the lower part of the face), was wrapped a gray 'kerchief. Seven of the girls, however, who always stood near the head of the line, wore veils of white tissue. The maiden's sleeves showed no organic connection with any outer garment; fitted the arm closely and were of some silk stuff, with stripes running around the arm. The whole costume was bright with harmonious colors.

About sixty of these maidens danced together, with arms interlaced in a double line, for hours. The dance was led by one or two young men at the head of the line—attached to the maidens only by means of a handkerchief. The music was only the humming of the girls—rarely did the words of the song become really articulate. The steps were simple, generally three forward, followed by three backward obliquely, so as to move in a circle.

I saw no "mixed dances" of men and women in Greece, though these have been imported to the cities. The men, however, as in Homer's day, have their own dances, which are much more vigorous than those of the girls.—Scribner's Magazine.

The Mills Bill a Bad Job.

Representative James E. Campbell, of Hamilton, Ohio, is quoted as saying: "I voted for the Mills bill and it is true we have passed it by a larger majority than we anticipated when the compilation of the measure was begun. It is true also that we secured three Republican votes and lost but four Democrats, but I have a premonition that we have made a bad job of it. You see, I sit on the floor of the House right in the centre of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means. I have been telling them for months that it was a fatal error to put wool on the free list and to make such a small reduction of the duty on sugar. I can go to the map and put my thumb on all the territory in the United States that produces sugar, while there is not a county in the country that does not grow wool. I don't understand how otherwise long-headed men on our side of the House have been demanding free wool as the great panacea of tariff reform. I do not expect to see more than four or five Democratic members returned to the next House from my state. I am not a candidate for re-election, and I do not believe I could be re-elected. I am what you would term a mild protectionist, and yet I have voted for a bill with strong free trade tendencies. If this bill means anything, it means a long step directly toward free trade, because it has put many of our leading productions on the free list. There may be nothing in the fact that we have passed the bill by a majority of thirteen—an unlucky number—but I have a general feeling that the Mills bill will be unpopular before the country and that it is a mistake. I voted for it because I did not feel that I ought to refuse to accept the judgment of the 160 men in my party in the House.

Related by an Ex-Confederate.

In reading the war memories of The Ledger, my mind goes back over those scenes of danger and death and fastens one, the most solemn and awful to me, that came under my observation during those trying times. Time, spring of 1884; place, camps near Dalton, Ga. Fourteen stakes planted firmly in the ground, fourteen men tied to these stakes, fourteen white pine coffins, one behind each stake; a white handkerchief tied over each man's face; the provost guard drawn up in front of the victims, and twenty thousand soldiers massed in the valley to witness the execution. I see the guard make ready, the commandent lowers a handkerchief—a rattle of musketry. I see some of the victims shrink, while others stand bolt upright. I see the dirt fly up in the rear of the condemned men, and I know some of the guards have missed purposely; the doctors pass along the line of the condemned and feel of their pulse. The rear rank of the guard odvance to within a few feet of the victims, single out certain individuals, make ready and fire. No missing this time; the heads of the remaining victims fall forward, the ghastly scene is over. I wondered then, I wonder now, if such a sacrifice was necessary.

We start back to camp, our heads bowed down by the awful scene we had just witnessed. No one spoke for some time, when a man by the name of Dave Defriese says: "Boys, I'll bet we have to get out of here in less than three days." "Why?" some one asked. "Because leaders that will have men treated that way will never prosper." Sure enough, it was not very many days before Sherman flanked us out of that position and we commenced falling back toward Atlanta. I was slightly acquainted with three of those men who were executed that day. They appeared to be passably good men. The charge against all fourteen was desertion.

The Dogs and the Robbers.

A tragical story is told of an adventure that happened to the monks of St. Bernard, when the breed of their celebrated dogs was at its full perfection, No less than thirty robbers to whom the supposed possession of the monastry offered booty, had, by degrees introduced themselves into the retreat, arriving in parties at intervals, and were always received in the most friendly manner. As soon as the whole band assembled they threw off their concealment and summoned the abbot to produce the keys of the treasure. The monk was, fortunately, a man of more resolute character than usually occurred in those places of seclusion, and did not lose his presence of mind. He observed to them mildly that their conduct was nuworthy and an ill-return for the hospitable attention they had received. The robbers, as may be supposed, were deaf to the appeal and continued their demand. "If it must be so," said the superior, "as we have no means of defending ourselves, I must submit; follow me, therefore to the spot where our treasury is kept." He led the way and was tumultously attended by the eager band. He placed his hand on a door, but before he turned his back and made another appeal. He was answered with execration, and no choice being left him he threw the door wide open. It was the den in which the dogs were kept; he raised his voice, to which a loud yell responded, then gave a rapid signal, and in an instant the powerful animals bounded forth upon their prey, tearing some, strangling others, and sending a few of the robbers who escaped their attack flying for their lives headlong down the mountain in frantic terror, to be dashed to pieces over the precipices which yanwed beneath their feet.

Do Figures Lie?

Let us see!

Two women had 30 chickens each, which they took to market. They agreed to divide equally the proceeds of their sales.

One sold her chickens 2 for $1, getting for the 30 chickens $15.

The other sold hers 3 for $1, getting for her 30 chickens $10.

This made $25 realized for the 60 chickens.

The merchant called on to divide the money said:

"You sold your 30 chickens 2 for $1, and you sold your 30 chickens 3 for $1. That makes 60 chickens at the rate 5 for $2. Well, 5 into 60 goes 12 times—twice 12 is 24, That makes $24 your chickens have brought."

But, as shown above, the women actually had $25 dollars in pocket. And yet the merchant's figures were right.

IN BLACK AND WHITE.

The city of Chester did not contain a brighter face than that of Ben Clement's wife. Ben was doing well in business, owned a neat little cottage and pleasant grounds, and had an office in the "Arcade," a block which was a central point for lawyers and other men of quiet advocation.

All of Ben's friends agreed that his wife was immensely charming, for three years of married life had brightened the beauty of a face that had always been attractive, and wrought a look of repose, with a slight accession of dignity, into her bright brown eyes.

On a certain winter's day Mrs. Clement took a trip down town. She was wrapped in furs, and the flush of health was on her cheeks. It was not often that she was seen in her husband's place of business, but she thought she would surprise him this afternoon by a short visit. So she walked into the broad passageway of the Arcade, ascended to the first gallery and approached Ben's office. She knew that she looked well, and upon her face was a smile of pleasurable anticipation at the appreciating face with which Ben would be sure to greet her. For Mr. Benjamin Clement had not yet got beyond the stage of admiring his wife.

On stepping inside Mrs. Clement was disappointed at discovering that the office was empty. Ben's coat and overshoes were in their places, but his hat was nowhere to be seen.

"He has stepped out for a moment; I will wait," thought Mrs. Clement.

She seated herself in Ben's office chair, directly in front of his desk, and speculated on the contents of all those legal looking documents in the pigeon holes. Then she looked out of the window at the opposite offices and finally lifted a sheet of blotting paper which lay on the desk before her. Its removal disclosed a sheet of cream-colored, gilt-edged, perfumed paper which was partly covered with a handwriting very familiar to her—that of Ben.

She began reading with idle curiosity, but quickly a startled look came into her face and her eyes opened with amazement as she read the following words:

"My Dear Laura:—How slowly a day drags along when it passes without one glance at your sweet face. I am uneasy every hour because I cannot be with you. I can only think of your blue eyes, your ruby lips and your smiles that seems like an angel's blessing. It seems an age, though it is only three days since I last took your hand in mine and looked into your dear face. But I have good news. I have arranged matters so as to go to the Adonis Club mask ball, and shall, of course, expect you to go with me. Our costumes will disguise us, and we will have a grand time. Be all ready by 9 o'clock on the evening of next:—"

Here this precious epistle abruptly broke off, it being evident that the writer had been interrupted and intended to finish it later.

Mrs. Clement read it through twice with transfixed eyes and blanched cheeks. Then came a flood of returning color and a wild throbbing of her heart. What should she do? Her first impulse was to tear the note in pieces; her next to wait for Ben and confront him with her knowledge of his perfidity.

She did neither, but hastily left the office, crossed the opposite gallery and entered the waiting room of a photographer's studio where she could sit and think, and at the same time look across at Ben's office.

It was not long before Ben made his appearance and entered his office, followed by a man whom she recognized as Swartz, a good-looking young Swede, who was janitor of the Arcade. Swartz also did errands for the occupants, and more than once had taken messages from Ben to his wife.

After ten minutes Swartz emerged. He carried a square white envelope in his hand, a smile on his face, and he walked briskly away.

Mrs. Clement had half a mind to overtake and question him, but she shrank from so undignified a proceeding. After sitting buried in thought for a few minutes she enveloped her face closely in a veil, left the photographer's parlor, and made her way hastily homeward.

Her brain, meanwhile, was in a whirl of perplexity. It seemed impossible that Ben could be false to her. Yet she had seen evidence in black and white, and if ever a man stood self-convicted, that man was Benjamin Clement.

In the seclusion of her own home her pent up agitation found vent in tears of mingled grief, indignation and bewilderment.

In the midst of her distress came the recollection of a social engagement. It was to spend the afternoon and take tea with a friend, Ben to follow at 6 o'clock.

"I'll go!" she exclaimed to herself "and I'll tell Mrs. Ives all about it, and ask her advice."

Being already sufficiently dressed for the occasion, which was to be a gathering of three or four young married couples, Annie Clement quickly dried her eyes, powdered her cheeks, and sallied forth.

A short walk brought her to the residence of Marion Ives, and Mrs. Clement was warmly greeted by a woman who like herself, was young and handsome and who, unlike herself just at that moment, was a happy wife.

"Oh, my dear Annie!" exclaimed Mrs. Ives, "how late you are. Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Gibbs have been here for more than an hour, and we have been just expiring with impatience waiting for you."

"Are you not well?" asked Mrs. Ives, tenderly, quick to discern something was wrong.

"Oh, yes, but a little tired," replied Mrs. Clement, who could not muster the courage to divulge her trouble.

She removed her wraps, followed her hostess into the parlor, and with simulated gayety joined in a lively chat that was going on. But there was a constant struggle between the weight of oppression on her heart and the determination to fulfill for the time being her social obligations.

Thus passed the time until the hour for tea arrived and the husbands appeared. There also came Mr. and Mrs. Hazen, another young married couple, the latter having been delayed by a call. "And it finally became so late that I waited for Dick'" said Mrs. Hazen, "and so here we are."

"I have something to tell you all," she added. "Not the men—it wouldn't interest them. Such a great joke! But it will keep until after tea."

Thereupon the other ladies were thrown into a fever of curiosity, the gratification of which, however, must be postponed for an hour.

Mrs. Clement watched Ben attentively after the party were seated at the table. She even introduced the subject of blondes and blue eyes, but never so much as a flitting trace of embarrassment or conciousness passed over his face.

"Is he so experienced in intrigue that he can brave it through with no sign of guilt?" thought Annie. But this thought was so distressing that she dismissed it as quickly as possible.

The tea was a success, and felicity seemed to reign in all hearts save that of Annie Clement.

At length the napkins were thrown down and the chairs pushed back.

"Now, ladies," said Mrs. Hazen, who was a plump and jolly creature, "Let us leave the gentlemen with their cigars. Come into the parlor while they are smoking, and I'll tell you my secret."

This was sufficient to provoke a stampede of the feminine members of the party, who were soon seated in a circle around Mrs. Hazen and waiting for the promised revelation.

"To begin with," said that lady, enjoying to the utmost the expectancy of her audience, "I have a very attractive looking housemaid, and she has a love affair on hand."

"Ah, a romance from real life," spoke up Mrs. Ives.

"Exactly—but no interruptions please. The dear girl has an admirer, and he has written her a letter. It is an invitation and a sort of declaration of love combined. The young man, too, is a very superior person, juding from his penmanship, spelling and the elegant stationery he uses."

"Did she show you the letter?" asked Mrs. Ives.

"Yes, and more than that, she placed it in my hands and asked me to write an answer.

"You see, she is a little doubtful regarding her own literary powers, and is very anxious that her reply shall be an irreproachable missive in all respects. I have her lover's letter here now, and I am going to read it to you, and we will then put our heads together and concoct an answer."

Mrs. Clement had listened thus far with languid interest, smiling only in a mechanical way and making but little pretense at being amused.

"Here is the letter," said Mrs. Hazen, and she began reading:

"My Dear Laura:—How slowly the days drag along without your sweet face in sight. I am uneasy every moment—"

Mrs. Clement suddenly half arose from her chair, with a look of amazement on her face. These were the very words with which Ben's letter began. She listened, and heard one by one the sentences that had so painfully impressed themselves on her mind, and finally sprang forward and looked over Mrs. Hazen's shoulder. Yes, there was Ben's handwriting, and the note was the same which she had seen in an unfinished state on his office desk. She was more bewildered than ever, and, resuming her seat, listened eagerly.

Mrs. Hazen finished reading the note, which concluded as follows:

"Be all ready for 9 o'clock on the evening of next Tuesday. With much love, your ever devoted

LOUIS SWARTZ."

"Who is Louis Swarts?" two or three voices inquired.

"He is the janitor of the Arcade, and also does errands for the men who have their offices there. He has been to our house more than once, and has fallen in love with Laura, which is my house maid's name."

"Of course he never wrote that note," exclaimed Mrs. Gibbs, "for he couldn't. He has evidently asked somebody to do it for him."

Mrs. Clement's heart gave a joyful thump. How the skies were clearing! And how kind Ben was to act as private secretary for Swartz!

"I am sure I don't know as to that," said Mrs. Hazen. "At all events I want you to put your wits together and help me compose a reply that will meet Laura's idea of elegance, eloquence and propriety, for she is as deeply in love with Swartz as he is with her."

The subsequent proceedings had but little further interest for Annie Clement. She watched the door of the dining-room until Ben appeared and then ran forward and grasped his arm with great ardor. When, later in the evening, they walked home, she astonished him by an unusual display of nervous vivacity; but it was not until they reached their home that she recounted to him, amid much hysterical laughter, the discovery she had made in his office, her subsequent hours of misery, and the happy issue out of a dark cloud of suspicion that had seemed supported by such conclusive evidence in black and white. At all of this Ben laughed heartily, and said he had intended at the first opportunity to relate to her his new experience as a writer of love letters for other people.—*O. S. "I want some consecrated lye," he slowly announced, as he entered the store.

"You mean concentrated lye," suggested the druggist as he suppressed a smile.

"Well, maybe I do. It does nutmeg any difference. It's what I camphor, anyhow. What does it sulppur?"

"Eighteen cents a can."

"Then you can give me a can."

"I never cinnamon who thought himself so witty as you do," said the druggist, in a gingerly manner, feeling called upon to do a little punning himself,

"Well, that's not bad, either," laughed the customer, with a syruptitious glance. I ammonia novice at the business, though I've soda a good many puns that other punsters reaped the credit."

Proud Father—My son, you have done very well at college and you have a bright future before you. I want you to study statesmanship and fit yourself for high duties. You may get into Congress. Do you read the papers regularly?

Son—Yes father.

"I am glad to hear that. What is the first duty of a congressman?"

"To reduce the surplus. Lend me a V, father,"

His wife had just returned from a tea party, and was wagging her tongue like a buzz saw, when he shut off further talk by quietly observing: "there is a loquacity which tells nothing." The next night he returned from lodge, laid his coat on the bed, and flung himself over the back of a chair, when she turned on a perfect Niagra of chin by remarking: "There is a silence which tells much."

MY DEAR FRIEND.

Adown the vale of Life together
We walked in spring and winter weather,
When days were dim, when days were bright;
My friend of whom God's will bereft me,
Whose kind, congenial spirit left me
And went forth in the Unknown Night.

I saw his step grow more invalid,
I saw his cheek grow pallid—pallid,
Wither like a dying rose;
Until at length being all too weary
For Life's rude scenes and places dreary,
He bade farewell to friends and foes.

This is his grave: The spring with flowers
Bestrews it in the morning hours,
Her rarest roses o'er him bowed;
And summer pauses to deplore him,
And weeping Winter arches o'er him
Her solemn drapery of cloud.

He was not faultless: God who gave him
Life, and Christ who died to save him
Sent Sorrow, wherewith he was tried;
And if as I, who loved him, name him,
There should be heard a voice to blame him,
May we not answer: Christ hath died?

Ah, verily! * * * I fancy often
I see his kindly features soften—
I mark his melting eye grow dim,
While Hunger, with its pained appealing,
Its want and woe and grief revealing,
Stretched its imploring palms to him.

He can not answer now: He never,
In all the dim, vast, deep Forever,
Shall speak with human words again,
He can not hear the song birds calling;
He can not feel the spring dews falling,
Nor hear the winter winds complain.

Deep is his sleep: He would not waken
Though earth were to her center shaken
By the loud thunders of a God.
Though the strong sea, by tempest driven,
With wailing waves rock earth and Heaven,
He would not answer from the sod.

So be it, friend. A little while hence,
And in the dear, deep, dreamless Silence;
We too shall share thy couch of rest,
When we have trod Life's pathways dreary,
Kind Death will take the hands grown weary,
And gently fold them o'er the breast.

Sleep on, dear friend! No marble column
Gleams in the lights and shadows solemn
Over the grasses on thy grave:
But flowers bloom there—the roses love thee;
And the tall oaks that tower above thee
Their broad, green banners o'er thee wave!

Sleep, while the weary years are flying;
While men are born, while men are dying;
Sleep on thy curtained couch of sod,
Thine be the rest which Christ hath given;
Thine be the Christian's hope of Heaven;
Thine be the perfect peace of God!

THE WRONG STATION.

A School-Ma'am's Blunder and Its Happy Results.

The afternoon train that connected some lonely, obscure towns in Maine with the rest of the world, was over two hours late. The premature darkness of a stormy winter's night had set in comparatively early in the afternoon, and, though it was barely seven o'clock, it seemed to the few weary passengers as though they had been traveling half the night.

There were two representatives of the gentler sex present, but one, I am almost tempted to say (and I think the conductor and brakeman would bear me out in my distinction); for while one, a shy, timid girl of nineteen or twenty, had quietly gone to sleep, the other, a lady of great asperity of voice and demeanor, would neither go to sleep herself nor render this comforting performance possible to any one in her immediate vicinity, but persisted in administering large pieces of her mind to the aforesaid conductor and brakeman concerning the delay of the train, and their shameful complicity with the storm that caused the delay.

When at last the brakeman threw open the door, in a slow, despairing way that showed great depression of spirit, and called out something that began with Hunter's and ended in a mournful, inarticulate howl, he brightened visibly at seeing the severe lady start up with a jerk and gather up a collection of heterogeneous parcels with an air of relief which, oddly enough, immediately communicated itself to the rest of the passengers.

He helped her off the train with a cheerful alacrity that was not apparently abashed by the icy contempt she unmistakably entertained for the railroad and every one connected with it from the president to the water boy.

The conductor promptly swung his lantern to signal the engineer, called out briskly, "all aboard," and sprang on to the moving train without stopping to notice that his expassenger was in a state of violent dissatisfaction over the trunk.

May Smith, the girl who had been asleep, started up with a bewildered air as the train left the station, thrust her hand into her pocket to see if her purse was still there, and pressing her face close to the window-pane, against which the whirling snow dashed and clung, tried to make out something of the landscape.

It was of no use; the window refused to do any thing more than to give back an image of a homesick girl with a tired, white, scared face, and also that of her near neighbor, a gentleman of such on exaggerated bucolic appearance that he seemed the caricature of himself.

She was afraid that she had been carried past her station, and made a little timid, irresolute movement toward addressing the formerly dejected brakeman, who now passed through the car, actually whistling the frollicking air of "Begone, Dull Care."

He passed by without noticing her slight movement, and a sudden recollection kept her from repeating it.

The aunt with whom she had lived ever since she could remember, had always emptied her largest vials of concentrated wrath on the heads of those girls who tried to "attract attention."

Fearing lest by an unnecessary question she herself might be classed with these reprehensible delinquents, she made no second attempt, but leaned back in her seat an unresisting prey to loneliness and foreboding.

She had never before been out of the quiet little town of Massachusetts where she had lived with her aunt until the death of the latter forced her to find some means of earning her own living.

Having had some correspondence with the "hiring" committee of a district school in a small village in Maine, she was now on her way to have her fate decided by the examining committee.

As her mind was firmly made up before leaving home that she could never return if she were disgraced by not passing her examination, and as her stock of money was not sufficient to hold out against any extended siege of expenses while she was waiting reinforcements in the shape of employment, her depression was not wholly unfounded.

The train soon came to another halt, the brakeman again roared out something that began with Hunter's and ended in some unintelligible syllable. May's face lighted up when she heard the name, and, starting up, she grasped her shabby, old-fashioned carpet bag with one hand, felt nervously in her pocket with the other, to make sure that her purse had not been abstracted within the last two minutes by any of the listless passengers, and hurried to the door.

The train had stopped at a little flag station, whose only accommodation for passengers was a small platform, at present covered with snow.

As May hesitated an instant on the car steps, a tall figure seized her, and carrying her across the platform deposited her in the sleigh, and the train moved off before she could recover from her surprise enough to ask timidly: "Where's my trunk?"

"You don't mean to say that I'm such an idiot that I've let the train go off an' carry off your trunk?" demanded the tall man in tones of poignant disgust.

"I don't see the trunk anywhere," she answered, ignoring the question of the stranger's imbecility.

"Wal, I snum," said her disconcerted companion, "you must think I'm the goldern—the biggest gump you ever come acrost. There wa'nt nothin' in it you wanted, was they?" he asked, as though people were in the habit of traveling with baggage for which they had no earthly use.

"Yes," she admitted, "every thing I have was in it, except what I have in this bag."

"Jewhitaker!" exclaimed the other, "ef you'd only chuck somethin' at me to pay for bein' such a loon, I'd feel better. I spose, though, you hain't got nothin' you want to waste on such a fool."

"You see it snowed, so I didn't much expect ye, though of course I'd hev come ef it had snowed bilin' water, an' ez I'd been a-waitin' for ye nigh on to three hours, I was so consummedly tickled to think you come I didn't stop to think about nothin' else. Can you git along without it to-night!"

"O, yes," she answered, "I don't care, if it isn't lost."

"Then that's all right," he said in a greatly relieved tone, getting in the sleigh beside her. "I'll get it for ye to-morrer ef I hev to overhaul every train in the State with my own hands. G'long!"

The horse moved a little, but refused to start.

"Git up!" he called louder, "what ails ye?" Then in a different tone he exclaimed: "Wal, by gracious! ef I ain't the biggest fool thet ever—I don't know what—I ain't unhitched the critter!"

While the crestfallen stranger proceeded to remove this slight obstacle to their locomotion, May burst into hysterical laughter.

"I don't blame ye none for laughin'," he said. "I shouldn't find no fault of ye said you wouldn't ride one step with such a knownothin' ez I be."

As there was no house in sight, and the snow was nearly two feet deep and still falling, no inviting alternative seemed to present itself, and he got back into the sleigh, saying plaintively: "I ain't always this way, but I was so bejiggled at seein' ye I don't seem to know whether I'm a-foot or a-horseback."

May was too bewildered and frightened to make much reply to the stranger's self-accusations.

She supposed that he was the "hiring committee" who was to meet her at Huntersville, where he lived, and take her to his home, where she was to board, but her natural timidity and morbid fear of doing any thing to "attract attention" kept her from asking any questions.

The night was very dark. A lantern hanging on the dashboard cast grotesque shadows of the horse on the roadsides, from which, now a snow drift, now an evergreen loaded with snow, apparently leaned forward for an instant, and then drew back into impenetrable gloom.

A vague sense of horror added itself to the homesickness of the trembling girl.

Perhaps the man beside her was no common-place committeeman at all—indeed this executive stranger was very unlike the ideal committee to whom she had sent her little re-written, re-punctuated letters, fearful lest his critical eye would discover some unpardonable grammatical error which would make her timid aspirations toward the dignity of a school ma'am absurd in his sight.

Perhaps he might be some robber who inhabitated the fastnesses of these gloomy mountains, who had left her trunk for some not very obvious reason of his own, and who would shortly add the contents of her bag and purse to his ill-gotten spoils. His features were not visible in the darkness and might wear an expression of inconceivable ferocity, but the tones of his voice were so sensible, kindly and whole-souled that she felt an unaccountable sense of comfort and security whenever he spoke, though in the long intervals of silence that fell upon them as they journeyed slowly and laboriously through the snowdrifts and darkness, her fears could hardly be controlled.

"You're a little thing, ain't ye?" he finally remarked, abruptly.

"Yes," she faltered, feeling that he might consider this an insurmountable obstacle in the way of her managing the big boys in school.

"Would that be any objection?"

"Land, no," he responded, reassuringly. "I like little women."

May had a dim, undefined feeling that when a school was regulated by the likes and dislikes of the committee, there was an imperative call for civil service reform somewhere.

A wild and improbable tale she had once heard of a school committee who always insisted on kissing all the female teachers flashed across her mind along with a vague fear that this man beside her might resemble him in this respect, but she blushingly dismissed it as an immodest suggestion, unworthy of any decorous imagination.

Presently her companion, after clearing his throat several times preparatory to speaking, but not being able to carry his conversational attempts further than an abashed "Gid dap" to his horse, began with a manifest effort and much unaccountable confusion and embarrassment, which he tried vainly to conceal by interpolating various remarks of encouragement to his horse: "I've got your letters an' you've got mine—g'lang—an' I'm suited an' pleased ez —ez—gid dap—but, ef you haint, all you've got to do is just to say—git out of that—the word, an' I shan't find no fault—what yer doin'—nor blame you none. I'm a kind man—do yer want me to hit yer again—ef I do say it—what ails yer?—an' I don't think you'll ever be sorry, but ef you should wanter—tend to yer bizness—back out, I wish you'd say so soon's you can convenient.

May listened to this incoherent harangue with a deepening of the confusion and alarm with which this whole adventure inspired her. She wished, for not the first time, that she had never thought of teaching school, but she answered bravely: "I don't know why I should withdraw now, if I am considered suitable for the place."

"Thet's the way to talk," responded the other, with great cheerfulness, "an' here we be to home."

The forlorn would-be school ma'am was again taken in strong arms, carried through the snow, and this time deposited in a queer little room, with a blazing open fire, presided over by an awkward boy who was the only occupant of the room.

"Here she is," said her host to the boy, "an' now take the horse—he ain't quite tuckered—an' go after the minister quick. He said he'd come, rain or shine, an' he's got to."

The examining committee in her native village had always been the minister, and she realized with a sinking heart that this energetic man determined to have the questions of her eligibility for the school decided this very night.

"You'd ruther hev him come to-night!" he asked, seeing something of her feeling in her face.

"Why yes," she gasped, "I suppose the sooner it's over the better."

"I kinder thought you'd sorter ruther hev him come to-night," he returned, relieving his easily aroused embarrassment by poking the fire vigorously. "D'you ever read that awful comical book—derned ef I can remember the name of it—I wish you could hev read it, you'd died a-laughin'. I can't remember how it all went, but there was one feller, he was a-talkin' to the minister, and sez he to himself, sez he—the minister, you know—I like you, pard! an' I'll lick any feller thet don't. Wal, them's my sentiments exactly. I'm an awful homely-lookin' feller, ain't I?" he asked, with sudden irrelevance.

May looked at him squarely for the first time.

He had taken off his fur cap and coat and stood before her, a blonde giant. But in his candid blue eyes and on his large ruddy cut features was an expression so akin to the kindly, hearty tones of his voice that the reassured girl felt that he was no mantain brigand.

"Why, no, I don't think you are," she replied after conscientious deliberation.

"I think you're pretty as a picture, any how," said, boldly. "I do, honest."

May's face grew hot with sham and indignation.

At last her bold, unmaidenly actions in corresponding with a stranger was bearing its bitter fruit. She seemed to hear her aunt's thin, sarcastic voice say: "Men know who they can say those things to."

"Where is this man's wife?" My thought. "Is she offended because I wrote to her husband and said nothing about her?" She grew cold at the thought.

"I don't want you to say any more such things to me," she plucked up courage to say.

"Why, I ain't agoin' to," he said, in a tone of alarm. "I hain't no such thount. Don't be mad with me," he added, pleadingly. "Why, here, I hain't asked you to take off your things nor hev nothin' to eat. I hain't got no manners."

He got her some cake and tea, and then with real delicacy left her alone until the minister came. The minister's wife accompanied him, and she came into the front room to May, leaving her husband and the man of the house in the kitchen.

"I was determined to come if it did rain," she exclaimed, kissing May fussively. "Isn't it so romantic; just like a story, your coming way up here. Well, I think you've done well. I suppose you're a little nervous; I was."

"Did you ever teach school?" asked May.

"Why, yes. I taught one term once," replied the visitor, looking as if she considered the remark irrelevant.

"It was too bad about your trunk wasn't it? Never mind, your dress is plenty good enough. Well, if you're all ready I'll call in the men. You don't feel faint, do you?"

When the minister came in May rose and stood before him like a child at school. Her heart beat so fast and such a mist came before her eyes that she did not realize that her host was standing beside her.

She made a terrible effort to grasp all the rules of grammar, arithmetic, geography, and spelling at once, and felt to her dismay that her brain was in a state of complete chaos.

The minister cleared his throat and "State," he began slowly.

"Geography is the first thing," she thought, and tried to get an instantaneous picture in her mind of the entire earth and all its diversions, but all she could think of were the names of Mount Popocatapetel and the river Yang-Tse-Kiang.

"The state of matrimony is one ordained by God for the purpose of—"The minister had got so far, when he paused, arrested by the look of horror and amazement on the girl's face, and her companion thinking the blank was for him to fill out, ejaculated in loud firm tones, "I do."

"Stop! quick!" cried the girl "there is some mistake."

"You can't expect me to say it just right the first time," said her host, realizing that he hadn't responded in quite the right place, but you'd orter make some allowances, seein' I never was married before."

"Married!" she cried, recoiling from him, "I came up here to teach school, and you know I did. I know my aunt would have said it was a dreadful venturesome thing to do, but no one has any right to marry me, if I did."

"But, my dear young lady," said the puzzled minister, "Tom—Mr. Hunter, has made a confidant of me from the first and he surely understood that you were to marry him."

"I advertised for a wife, you remember," said the crestfallen Mr. Hunter, turning to her, "and you answered it——"

"I did not," cried May, indignantly. "I wrote to Mr. Hilliard, of Huntersville, for a school."

"There is a Mr. Hilliard at Huntersville," said the minister.

"This is Hunter's Point," said the minister's wife, who had been trying vainly to get in a word.

"I must have got off at the wrong station," gasped May, sinking into a chair. "I have made a terrible blunder."

"It does seem to be a dreadful mixed up mess, but p'raps we can straighten it out, said Mr. Hunter, dolefully. Isn't your name Maria Smith."

"My name is May Smith," she answered, rather shortly.

"Now look here, my dear," cried the minister's wife, "this is rather awkward, I know; but I think I can find a way out of the labyrinth. My name is Mrs. Seavor—we'll begin at the very beginning—and Mr. Seavor is an ordained minister come up here to marry you, May Smith, to Tom Hunter, one of the best fellows that ever lived. Now," said she, clapping her hands enthusiastically, "why can't we have the wedding after all? I'll vouch you'll never get a better husband if you search the wide world over. I know you don't know him, but I'll guarantee that you'll never be sorry."

"If you only will," said Mr. Hunter, pleadingly; "I've taken such a shine to you."

"My friends," said Mr. Seavor, "I dislike very much to interfere with the romantic procedure that Mrs. Seavor has laid out."

"I never could consent to it, never," interrupted May.

"In any case," he continued, "it is my duty to remind you all that Mr. Hunter has agreed to marry some one, and the lady in question would have cause to think herself unfairly treated if he married any one else."

Mr. Hunter groaned as he perceived the cogency of this reasoning.

"I'll do the square thing by her," he said, "but I was never so disappointed in my life."

Mrs. Seavor staid that night with May, keeping her awake until nearly morning to listen to the praises of Mr. Hunter.

"If you can't find her," said Mrs. Seavor in the morning to Mr. Hunter and May, as they started to drive over to Huntersville in search of her school and his stray betrothed, "if any thing happened to her—though most likely there hasn't—things never do happen the way we want them to, except in books—but if they should, just bring May right back to my house for dinner, and we'll have just the prettiest wedding that ever was—in spite of her"—she added, meaning the absent Maria Smith.

From which it will be seen that the unconquerable Mrs. Seavor, although a minister's wife, let her sympathies run away with her sense of abstract right and justice.

The morning was bright and mild, but the ride was a very silent one.

Mr. Hunter wore an expression of suffering and resolution that would have done credit to a mediæval martyr.

Mrs. Hilliard met them at the door, "Wal, yes," she admitted, "there was a lady there who came on the train the night before, the new school ma'am, an' she guessed she'd hev a pretty good gover'ment—she's got the snap to her. Yes, they could see her," and she ushered them into the presence of May's fellow traveler of the day before.

"Is this Maria Smith?" asked Tom, in a tone that showed he feared the worst.

"It is," ejaculated that personage, resentfully.

"I thought so," murmured Tom, gloomily. "There's been some mistake, Miss; this little girl's come up here to teach school and made a mistake an' got off——"

"Will you shut your mouth, you ninny," snapped Miss Maria, with such asperity that instead of complying with her request Tom stood with it wide open.

"If Mary Smith," she went on, scornfully, "has made a mistake, that's her lookout—though I guess she didn't make no mistake—she knew what she was about fast enough. I found that I was expected to teach school and that's just what I'm goin' to do; and as for you, you blundering know-nothing, if you ever open your head and say I didn't come here to teach school, and found there wasn't any fool of a man here to meet me, as he'd agreed to, I'll have the law on you."

As the two guilty culprits hurried toward the door, Miss Maria added, witheringly, that she hoped "this would be a lesson to him not to trifle with a gentle, loving, trusting heart—meaning her's—again."

"There's a trunk here I've no use for," she called after them.

"I ain't a callin' no names," said Tom, solemnly, as they drove off, "but there's such things as narrer escapes! And now we'll go back to Mrs. Seavor's—you know what she said."

"Mr. Hunter," said May, tearfully, "I must go home. Please take me to the depot."

"Home! Git out!" said Tom, incredulously; "I can't give you up now."

"You say this because you pity me for losing my school," she faltered.

"No, I don't, honest," he exclaimed; "but I love you, darling, an' ef you'll only marry me I'll stan' by yer thro' thick an' thin, ez long ez we both do live."

She lifted her eyes to his and saw the love and comfort he offered her in vivid contrast to the lonely, troubled life she would lead without him. The horse, judging by the loose-hanging reins that not much was expected of him, stopped and gazed pensively at the bright, snowy landscape. A strange, conscious silence fell on the two in the sleigh.

"I'm afraid," said May, shyly, "that if we stay here we'll be late to dinner with Mrs. Seavor!"—Ethel Gorham Clarke, in Chicago Inter Ocean.

UNCLE SAM'S HORSES.

How Animals in the Cavalry Service Are Examined and Branded.

The inspection is done by a board of three or six officers. One by one the horses are led up for inspection. An examination is first made of the horse's eyes, teeth, limbs and body. His actions under examination are likewise taken note of. He is then saddled and mounted in the presence of the board. He must yield to the bridle and bit easily. Then he is walked one hundred yards and return, after which he is started on a fierce gallop. Returning to the inspectors he is unsaddled and a final inspection is made. If this second examination does not reveal any physical imperfections he is pronounced accepted and is branded with the National trade mark. U. S., on the left shoulder.

Being accepted, the equine is turned over to the care of the Assistant Quartermaster, who, as soon as he receives all the horses contracted for, distributes them through the department. Often special purchases of horses are made. This occurs when a large lot of horses are missing in one troop, and it is impossible to wait until the end of the quarter. Not infrequently the ravages of the glanders or other diseases peculiar to the horse, or a raid of Indians on the corral at a frontier post, are responsible for the depletion of the "mounts" of a cavalry troop. In the distribution of the horses care is exercised in regard to color. As near as possible, black horses are kept in one troop, bay horses in another, and so on. While it perhaps would not strike any one very forcibly as a bad arrangement to see a captain riding at the head of a black horse company on a white steed, yet it would form an ill-advised combination to see several troopers on white horses sprinkled through the company.

The enlisted cavalrymen are supplied with mounts at the expense of the Government, but officers are required to purchase their horses. When the horses reach the company for which they were purchased, the officers are entitled to the privilege of selecting one or two as each desires, and paying the assistant quartermaster for the actual cost of the horse or horses taken. One troop of each regiment is compelled to take the leavings, as far as color is concerned. This troop, when mounted, is not a bad imitation of a rainbow, on account of the diversity of hues.

The owners of horses name them with a sort of acrostical reference to their company's title. Thus the names of all horses in Company A begin with that letter. The horses are well cared for in stables which are kept clean and neat. The name of each trooper is placed on his horse's manger, right above the name of the horse. No private is allowed to take his steed from the stable, unless it is in the line of duty, without securing a permit from the commanding officer.—Detroit Free Press.

SOME LIVELY KICKS.

Vigorous Extracts from a Late Issue of the "Arizona Kicker."

OUR POLICY.—Heretofore, as our readers know, the Kicker has almost entirely abstained from publicly criticising the evils which all know to exist under our noses. We have become tired and disgusted with ourselves for this lack of spunk, and next week we shall open a red-hot campaign on

The mayor,
The common council,
The fire department,
All secret societies,
The saloons,
The gambling dens,

And on various other organizations and institutions reeking with corruption.

It will be a spicy issue. It will make more than a ton of human hair stand on end. It will make a thousand hearts thump like pile-drivers. Chicanery, deceit, hypocrisy, theft, robbery, arson and murder will be properly tagged off and the tags pinned to the right coat-tails.

Order your extra copies at an early date. Advertisers should send in their copy by Saturday. Don't neglect this golden opportunity. Another may never come."

A CANDID OPINION.—We have received visits from several of our leading politicians to inquire why the Kicker doesn't take a decided political stand in favor of one party or the other. It is a question easily answered. We are not publishing a newspaper for fun. Our convictions all run to publishing a dictionary or an almanac, thus leaving us neutral in politics.

If the Kicker flies the Democratic flag and hustles for Cleveland and Thurman it must have some solid assurance that after election the editor will receive a call. A call with a salary of about $3,000 hitched to it would just about fit our shape.

If the Kicker puts up the Republican ticket and blows for its success it must have something in writing to fall back on after election. We think we could fall back on a post-office of the second class and not fracture our anatomy.

We sat up all night last night waiting for a committee of Prohibitionists to come along and get down to facts, but the bridges were down and they didn't come. We don't say that it all depends on the Kicker which party rules for the next four years, but we do solemnly affirm that the editor will keep clear of the whole mob and publish nothing but poetry and local news unless some pretty solid promises are held out to arouse his slumbering convictions. We are not for sale, but we do hanker for office.

STOPPED HIS PAPER.—Old Steve Bridgeman, who has several times been alluded to in these columns as the meanest white man in Arizona, has stopped his paper because we did not have a column editorial on the Fourth of July. He says we are no patriot, and that a man who can't whoop 'er up for Independence Day is a cussed rebel.

We have scratched his name off the list, and if he doesn't quit lying about us we'll scratch his carcass off the face of the earth.

As to the Fourth of July, we were born on that day. As to patriotism, we've got more in our heels than old Steve could hold in his whole body. The man who intimates that we don't take off our hat every time we hear the name of Washington is a liar and a horse-thief. Our editorial on the Fourth was a solid chunk of patriotism weighing twenty-five pounds, but was crowded out to make room for the advertisement headed: "How to Cure a Bad Breath." We know our gait and we think we know the great need of most of our townspeople. As to old Steve Bridgeman, we are expecting two or three of his six or seven wives to drop in on us any day and furnish us some powerful good reading matter. Don't be uneasy, Stephen—we'll get to you in a few days.

WARNING.—We are no fighter. We have neither the sand nor the muscle to make one. We always knuckle unless there's a chance to run. We admit to a dozen lickings in the last three months, and in every case we were the only one who suffered. However, we want to warn the coyote who plastered our office door with mud the other night that the worm will turn. We are the worm. When we turn he had better look out. We can be kicked, cuffed, insulted and abused up to a certain limit. How far off the limit is, we don't know; but, when we reach it, we shall be a bad, bad man to fool with.—Detroit Free Press.

A COOKING CLOCK.

The Yankee Multum in Parvo Invented by a New Bedford Man.

A New Bedford correspondent: "The latest achievement in portable double action furniture is the cooking clock, now on exhibition here.

"It is made of white wood, stained cherry, and is constructed after the style of the old-fashioned grandfather's clock. Here the resemblance ceases, however, for before one is through inspecting its multiform surprises, one wonders whether some bright little automaton will not spring out of a concealed drawer or secret receptacle and offer you a diamond ring and a chromo.

"In the first place the lower part of this mighty engine of domestic economy contains a gasoline stove, which when in use is pulled out like a drawer from its resting place. Below the stove is a receptacle for kitchenware, while above it is a china closet containing four shelves. Above all this is perched a calendar clock, back of which is attached a gasoline vapor tank, which is connected with the stove by a pipe concealed behind the case.

"You might suppose that this collection of conveniences would have satisfied its enterprising inventor—but no. To the left and fitted securely to one side of the case is an Argand burner supplied with gas generated by the gasoline vapor tank above mentioned. When cooking is in progress the woodwork of the stove clock is protected by a sheet of asbestos paper, which is placed back of the stove. When the stove, china closet, etc., are not in use they are pushed back into the case, the front of which is decorated with a handsome mirror.

"Besides this multiplicity of useful combinations the ingenious inventor has found room within the magical case for a writing desk and a drawer for writing materials.

"What more in the way of condensed comfort can one ask for in one article of furniture? With one of these stove clocks and a folding bed in a room the occupant has a kitchen, bedroom and parlor all in one."—Jewelers' Weekly.

READING FOR THE YOUNG.

WHEN YOU'RE A BOY.

Uncle's Advice.

"When I'm a man," said Harry,
With self-important air,
"I mean to be both great and good,
And famous everywhere.
From books I'll gather wisdom,
And learn from nature, too;
And all in doubt shall come to me
To know what they shall do—
When I'm a man.

"I'll be so brave and stalwart,
Cowards I'll put to shame;
I'll deal so kindly with the poor,
They all will praise my name.
I will not be a spendthrift,
And so, when I grow old,
I can afford to rest from work
And live upon my gold—
When I'm a man.

"A worthy resolution,"
Said uncle, with a smile;
"But what will you accomplish
With your boyhood, all the while?
If you would gain great knowledge,
Your time is now, my lad,
And now you mold your nature
By actions good or bad—
When you're a boy.

"Be always true and honest,
And do not wait for praise;
Tread firm the path of duty,
Though it lies in rugged ways,
'Tis by small acts our worth we show;
Now, follow well this plan,
And you will rear the structure
Of a great and goodly man—
When you're a boy."

—Ella Randall.

A WICKED DEED.

The Happy Home—How It Was Ruthlessly Destroyed by Thoughtless Fun-Loving Boys.

High up among the boughs of an old apple-tree, in farmer Brown's orchard, two robins had built a pretty little nest. Twigs and straw and leaves had been used in making it, and inside it was lined with soft bits of cotton and hair. Perched on a high branch of the tree, hidden by lovely apple-blossoms and by young, tender green leaves, surely a more secluded and more beautiful spot could not have been found. In a little while four cunning eggs appeared in the nest, and then four cunning little birdies, with wide open mouths and chirping cries, were added to the family circle.

The parent birds were as happy as the day was long, and in their language—for birds do talk, you know—praised their little ones and rejoiced in their sweet little home.

Every morning the father bird flew away bright and early to get breakfast for his family. Then he would perch upon the edge of the nest, or fly upon the boughs near it, and talk to his little ones, amusing them until the mother bird came back.

So days passed, each one like the other, until the wee birdies were almost old enough to fly. They were growing large and strong, with an increasing appetite, and a constant demand for the worms, flies and other choice bits of food brought them by their parents. It was a happy home, but oh! the pity of it that it should be ruthlessly destroyed!

One morning the father bird said to his wife: "My dear, I am going some distance from home this morning to get some dainties for you and the little ones. Don't feel worried if I am late." And away he flew, darting swiftly through the bright sunshine, intent upon the surprise he was going to take back to the nest.

Some grown-up people are just stupid enough to insist that birds and animals have no language of their own, but they are mistaken; every thing that has life has a means of communication with the species, and it is to them what our language is to us. Birds, and beasts and insects plot and plan, love and hate, quarrel and make up, just as we do, and they also experience sorrow and joy.

A few days previous, while flying through a swamp below the orchard, Robin had discovered a root birds are particularly fond of, and had determined to take home a supply at the very first opportunity; and on this beautiful morning he intended going foraging, to see what nice things he could find. Reaching the swamp, he began to cut off bits of the dainty with his sharp little bill, carrying them one by one to the high branches of a tree, near by, so they would be safe until he could put them in the home storehouse. Suddenly he was startled by a sound all birds fear—the noise of boyish voices. Looking about sharply with his bright, bead-like eyes, he spied a group of boys coming around a bend in the swamp, laughing, talking and shouting as boys always do when they are in the country for a holiday, or, for that matter, at any time and any where.

These were not bad boys—at least you could not think so after glancing at them. They were well dressed, neat, and bright, intelligent little fellows, full of fun and mischief, and determined to get every bit of pleasure possible out of the day before returning to their city homes. Not wicked boys, yet in a few hours they had spread ruin and riot before them and after them, and on every side of them, and left turmoil and trouble in their wake.

First, they caught a stray dog, tied an old tin can to his tail, and then chased him down the road, hooting and yelling like a band of Comanche Indians; then they raced a pet kitten up a tree, and frightened the poor little thing almost to death by throwing stones at it; chased the chickens about the yard until they were ready to drop from exhaustion; and finally beat the poor pigs with switches until their indignant squeals brought every body to the pen to see what was the matter. This last exploit secured their banishment from the farm until dinner, so they started out to amuse themselves in other ways, and here they were.

Robin's was an old bird, and knew better than to trust himself to the mercy of his enemies, so he quietly rested on a tree-branch, intending to wait till the boys had gone before resuming his labors. But his red breast among the bright green leaves was too conspicuous a mark to escape a boy's keen eyes, and almost as quick as I can write it one of them took aim with a dart-blower, blew lustily through it, and sent a tiny, needle-like dart right into the little bird's breast! With a faint little chirp of pain he dropped to the ground, dead, and was quickly surrounded by the cruel boys, and passed from hand to hand, so the "good shot" could be commented upon and complimented. Then they tossed the poor little dead bird into the bushes, without giving a thought to the crime they had just committed.

At home the mother bird was worrying over Robin's absence, and the little ones were crying for their dinner. It was now high noon, and they had had nothing to eat since breakfast. She did not like to leave them alone, but as they grew more and more impatient she finally concluded to go in search of Robin. Giving them many injunctions she flew away to the swamp, Here and there she circled, flying low to the ground, among the bushes, up in the tree branches, everywhere she thought he might be, chirping to him, calling him, her little heart filled with a thousand fears. Perched on a low bush she was wondering where to go next, when ping! through the air came a stone, then another, and another, until, bruised and bewildered, she started to fly to a tree, where she thought she would be out of danger. But oh, dear! just as she rose from the bush a shower of stones fell around her, one heavier than the rest striking her full on the head. She fell back among the bushes lifeless, not many yards from where the same cruel boys had thrown her mate.

In the nest the little ones were calling lustily for food. Their little bodies, but scantily covered with feathers, were chilled and cold, and they were hungry and frightened. The hours passed and they were still alone, still hungry and cold. The sun went down, night came on, and as it grew darker it began to rain.

"Cheep! cheep! cheep!" called the four wee birdies. But only the raindrops pattering on the leaves answered them.

"Cheep! cheep! cheep!" they were so cold, so hungry, so frightened.

"Cheep! cheep! cheep!" the nest was dripping wet, and one little bird was lying cold and still. He would never be hungry and frightened again.

"Cheep! cheep! cheep!" The night wore on, and soon another little bird was dead.

"Ch-e-e-p! ch-e-e-p!" The cries were growing fainter, for now there was but one little bird living.

"Ch-e-e-p! ch-e-e-p!" His voice was getting more feeble, for he was chilled by the rain and the cold bodies of his dead brothers.

"Ch-e-e-p! ch-e-e-p! ch-e-e-p!" When the bright sun smiled in the nest the next morning, there were four dead little birds lying there, while down in the swamp, on the wet grass, lay the bodies of Robin and his mate. Was it not a cruel murder?—Marie Flaacke, in Judge's Young Folks.

Pet Chickens.

Stella and Laura had some little white bantams, which were very tame, and of which they were very fond. There were two of them—a rooster and a hen. Neither was larger than good-sized pigeons.

The rooster put on far more airs, and held his head higher, than the great Cochin-China in the barn-yard, and he always managed to be ahead of the latter in getting off the first crow in the morning. In the winter the children were fond of coasting, and they seldom thought of starting out without "Tip" and "Ty," as they had curiously named their feathered friends.

These chickens really seemed to like to ride. The little girls would get on the big sled, each holding her pet, and off they would start. Sometimes the sled would be sent down, carrying the chickens alone. "Tip" would generally keep his balance, but his mate always became frightened and jumped off when about half-way down.

The children kept these chickens for over three years. One night a weasel got into the hen-house and killed them.

Some time after this, Stella found a little chicken with its leg badly broken. She carried it to Adam, the gardner. The leg was so badly crushed that it could never be of any use, and Adam cut it off. Then he carefully bound up the stump. After a while it healed, and he made as well as he could a wooden leg, which he bound on to the stump. The chicken thrived, and seemed to take kindly to its wooden leg.

Sometimes it forgot, and tried to scratch with it, but it would not work.

It had a peculiar walk—a sort of hop, from which the children christened it "Hoppy." At night they put it up in a box made on purpose for it, fastened up inside of the hen-house. Hoppy lived to a good old age, but never did any thing remarkable.

—A novelty in the way of commencement exercises was seen at a New York grammar school. After the singing and recitations the girls made strawberry shortcake and poached eggs in the presence of their guests and distributed them among their friends. One of the trustees said in a speech that the time would come when, if any one wanted a cook, he would come straight to the school to get one.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

—It pays to plow the second crop of clover under. It may seem like a loss of hay, but the benefit to the land will more than balance the apparent loss.

—Raspberry Pudding: Bake in loaf, one cupful of sugar, one and one-half cupfuls of milk, a piece of butter the size of an egg, two eggs, one heaping teaspoonful of baking-powder, flour for cake batter with one pint of raspberries stirred in lightly.—Good Housekeeping.

—For biliousness squeeze the juice of a lime or small lemon into half a glass of cold water, and stir in a little baking soda; drink while it foams. To be taken when rising in the morning. This will also relieve the sick headache, if taken in the beginning.

—Sheep, remarks the New England Farmer, should never be allowed to pasture on land which has been top-dressed with manure, or to graze on land which is liable to be overflowed or which contains stagnant pools, on account of the danger of the sheep becoming infested with parasitical life.

—Farmer's Soup: Mince three onions and fry in butter; add a tablespoonful of flour and a quart of water, with three chopped carrots, two turnips, a bunch of celery and a little parsley. Stir until it boils, and season with salt and pepper. Cut some crusts of bread, dry in the oven, and throw them in the soup.

—Hot alum water is the best insect destroyer known. Put the alum in hot water and let it boil till it is all dissolved; then apply the solution hot with a brush to all cracks, closets, bedsteads and other places, where any insects are found. Ants, bedbugs, cockroaches and creeping things are killed by it; while it has no danger of poisoning the familp or injuring the property.—Farm and Fireside.

—The best egg-producing food for summer is wheat and oats with milk and bran mash. For winter, wheat, boiled potatoes, mixed warm milk and bran for morning feed; at night, corn and oats mixed. Fresh meat and table refuse are also essential, as are pulverized bones, lime and oyster shells. Vegetables and fruits are also fed with profit, and great care must be taken that they have plenty of pure fresh water.—Prairie Farmer.

BALED AND LOOSE HAY.

The Advantages of the Former Recognized by All Authorities.

The inventor who produces a cheap, simple and effective machine for rolling hay after it has been cured and is lying on the ground will merit the thanks of farmers and will be in the way to fame and fortune. Bales of hay that are cylindrical in form will not pack as closely together as those that are rectilineal in shape, and are, therefore, not quite as desirable. But it is likely that a machine could be more easily constructed to make the former out of dried grass as it lies on the ground ready to be gathered by the rake. If such a machine could be produced it would do the work now performed by the horse or hand-rake, the pitchfork and the hay-press. It would put the hay in a condition where it could be easily handled, without the use of the fork or the loader. If the bales did not weigh more than a hundred pounds each a strong man could pick them up and put them on a cart or wagon. Only one man would be required to load hay or to move it from the cart into the barn or under the roof that was to protect it.

Baled hay is so compact that it occupies but little space. If hay could be baled in the field nearly all farmers would have buildings to store the entire amount they raised. Round bales could be piled up like cord-wood and covered with a roof of thatch. As only the ends of the bales would be exposed they would receive little injury. Few farmers in the West can afford to build barns that will hold all the hay they raise, and as lumber is constantly advancing in price there is little prospect that they will ever be able to store in buildings all the loose hay they produce. The waste of hay placed in stacks or ricks is large. Much of it is injured or ruined by the rain and snow, and a still larger amount is blown away. In feeding it out to stock much is blown away. Bales of hay can be moved to the places where animals are to be fed without loss. They are convenient when hay is to be sold in a village, and baled hay will always bring a larger price in towns, as most people who buy it have small stables. It is also preferred, for the reason that it does not litter up the premises.

Hay is the best preserved in bales, and animals of all kinds will eat it cleaner than they will loose hay. It keeps its color better, and preserves most of its aroma. In these respects it is like hops and medicinal herbs. The free circulation of air through hay, hops and herbs used in cookery and medicines carries off the volatile matter that is of the highest value. Clover hay can be kept in bales so as to preserve the color and fragrance of the blossoms. If clover hay is kept in a stack it becomes very dark colored, loses its fragrance, and is very likely to mold. When these changes take place no kind of animals will eat it readily, and it will be of little value to such as do eat it. The feeding value of baled hay as determined at various experimentel stations is from ten to twenty per cent. greater than that of loose hay. The longer it is kept the greater is the difference in its feeding value. The loss in keeping hay made from common prairie grass is smaller than in the hay made from clover and timothy, chiefly for the reason that it packs closer in the stack, rick or mow. —Chicago Times.

—"Jones," said one traveling man to another, "are you worth a dollar?" "I am." "Ah—glad to hear it. Could you accommodate me with a loan of it?" "Why yes; just keep it." "Keep it!" "Yes; the dollar I referred to is one that I loaned you a couple of weeks ago."—Merchant Traveler.

The Agonies of Lumbago.

EAST RIVER NATIONAL BANK, NEW YORK, March 30, 1886.

It gives me great pleasure to add my testimony in favor of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. Last October I had a very severe attack of lumbago and suffered untold agony; could not turn in bed or get in any position without assistance, and with pains almost unbearable; the folks suggested ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. As soon as possible I had one applied to the small of my back, and to my great surprise I experienced almost instant relief; I continued wearing it until entirely cured, and am happy to say that I have not had the slightest symptoms of Lumbago since. They are a wonderful and valuable plaster for Lumbago, and I take much pleasure in recommending them. W. S. PHILLIPS.

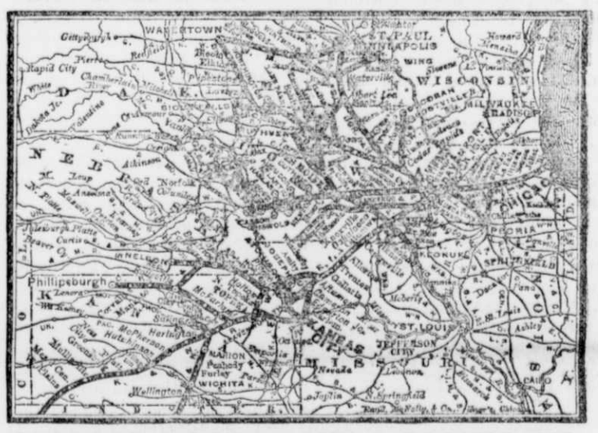
TESTIMONIALS WORTHY OF CONFIDENCE.



My daughter Maud has used Hibbard's Rheumatic Syrup and Plasters, which you so strongly recommended her to try for inflammatory rheumatism. Her limbs were badly swollen, and the poor girl was in terrible agony. In the midst of the pain we wound the Plasters about her limbs, and, as a result the swelling was reduced and she became quiet and rested. The syrup corrected her indigestion, cleansed the rheumatic poison from her blood, and she is now able to be around the house. Hibbard's Rheumatic Syrup and Plasters are remedies of great merit. REV. J. ROBERTS, Pastor First M. E. Church, Fremont, Mich.

ATHENS, Mich., Dec. 20, 1887.—While employed as agent of the Michigan Central Railroad Company at Augusta, Mich., about seven years ago, my kidneys became diseased, and I have been a great sufferer ever since. Have consulted the leading physicians of this city and Ann Arbor, and all pronounced my case Bright's disease. Suffering under a very severe attack in October last, began taking Hibbard's Rheumatic Syrup, and am today a well man. It affords me pleasure to render suffering humanity any good that I can, and in speaking of the remedy, allow me to say that I think it the greatest medicine in the the world. E. LAZELERE, Agent M. Reception of Hon. James G. Blaine.

NEW YORK, August 10. — The friends and admirers of Mr. Blaine who had spent two days down the bay waiting for his arrival on the City of New York, were delighted to learn this morning that the vessel at last was here. Many of them had made arrangements to have telegrams sent to their houses the moment the steamer was sighted and these were aroused in the middle of the night to receive the news. Others who arose at daybreak found the same news in the morning papers. It had been announced that the steamer chartered to convey the Republican club of New York and their many invited guests, representing nearly every State in the Union, would start promptly at 7 o'clock down the bay to welcome Mr. Blaine.

From 6:30 o'clock until 7 a steady stream of people down Cortland street to pier 18, where the steamboat Laura M. Starin, instead of the Sam Sloan, was waiting to receive them. They consisted mainly of the same men who had started down on the Sloan on the two preceding days. Nearly every coat was decorated with a badge. From many of the breast pockets fluttered the ends of red, white and blue handkerchiefs, and in numberless hatbands were pinned small white plumes.

About 8 o'clock the Starin met the City of New York outside the narrows. The Starin turned about and both vessels slowly steamed up the bay bow and bow. Cheer after cheer rose from the decks of the Starin, although it was yet impossible to distinguish Mr. Blaine's form among 2,000 that stood on the decks of the huge steamer. As the vessels neared each other Mr. Blaine's form was at last made out, standing in a group of friends on the upper deck forward. As cheer after cheer arose Mr. Blaine bowed repeatedly. He was neatly dressed in a dark cutaway coat and light trousers and brown derby hat.

As soon as Mr. Blaine came aboard of the Starin Mr. Bartlett, president of the Republican club of New York, greeted him, and delivered the address of welcome.

Mr. Blaine, in response, spoke as follows:

"MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE REPUBLICAN CLUB AND FELLOW CITIZENS:—To enable you to appreciate this welcome each and every one of you should be absent from home and country for the long period of fourteen months. I am sure you can have little conception of the great gratification of that instant when I saw the shores of the great Republic. I cannot tell you how deeply grateful I am to be remembered in this manner by you and these assembled gentlemen. It is a scene I shall never forget. It is an occasion which I assure you I appreciate from the depths of my heart. It is shadowed only by the sad event which greeted us as the first piece of American news that we heard—the death of General Sheridan, a man who was above party and stood for the Union of the States. [Shouts of "Good."] With that exception my arrival upon my native shore was unattended by anything but joy and happiness.

"The campaign on which you are about to enter should be prefaced, if that were possible, by every voter in the United States seeing what I have seen, ("Good, good") and hearing what I have heard during the last year. [Applause.] The progress of the campaign in the United States is viewed from the European standpoint with an interest as profound as it is in the United States. It is the opportunity of England. It is the long-looked for occasion upon which the cheaper labor and the cheaper fabrics of the Old World expect to invade the New and lower the wages of the American workingmen to the European standard. [Great applause.] It is not a contest of capital against capital; it is not a contest of partisan against partisan. It is much higher than either of these. It transcends all party motive. [Applause.] Whether the great mass of American citizens who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow shall be seriously reduced in their emolument from day to day [applause]—that is the whole pith and moment of this question. Anything that adverts the question from that single point is a weakening of the campaign. [Applause and cries of "Good."] I say here, as I hope to say with much more elaboration, (loud cheering and cries of "That's what we want")—I say here that THE WAGES OF THE AMERICAN LABORER CANNOT BE REDUCED EXCEPT WITH THE CONSENT AND THE VOTE OF THE AMERICAN LABORER HIMSELF. THE APPEAL LIES TO HIM. It comes to his door and asks him whether, with the great power of the franchise and the great majority he possesses in his own hands, he is willing for himself and his associats, his children and his children's children, to take the fatal step, at the bidding of an American Congress and an American President who are governed by that element which sought to destroy this nation.

"But, gentlemen, it is not a time for a political speech. My heart is too full to enter at this time on lengthened argument. In this moment of welcome and joy, getting home to old scenes and old friends, I must be allowed to enjoy the pleasant emotions of the occasion. I can only add my fervent thanks to each and every member of the club and to all my friends for the generous and joyous welcome they have extended to me in the harbor of New York."

About 8 o'clock the crowd around Madison Square numbered many thousands. The people whiled away the time shouting for Blaine, Harrison and Morton. The crowd represented all classes of society. On the stand were J. P. Archibald, Master Workman Magee and a number of other labor leaders, as well as officers of the various Republican organizations here and out of town. S. B. Elkins, Percy Carson, and Walker Blaine and others were also conspicuous.

When Mr. Blaine appeared on the stand Mr. Ford again called the meeting to order, and called on David Healy to read an address on behalf of the workingmen of New York to Mr. Blaine. The address was a strong indorsement of protectionism. Mr. Blaine was then introduced ,and after the applause subsided said:

"MR. CHAIRMAN:—It would be considerable egotism on my part to take this magnificent domonstration as personal altogether to myself. It rather signifies the great popular interest in the question upon which I am supposed at least to have a consistent record and an earnest zeal. [Applause.] You have here before you a contest in which that great issue is to be settled by the American people for perhaps an indefinite period, the one way or the other. The year 1887 was prosperous and the President at its close proposed a radical change in the industrial system, which had produced the great prosperity, and since that day there has been confusion in the commerce and manufactures of the United States. [Applause.] The question before the American people is whether he and his administration shall be sustained in that movement. Against him, the Republicans having the best cause, have nominated the best man. [Applause.

"They have given to you for President a man of sound experience, a man of heroic record in the war, a man of great purity of character, a man of great firmness and worthy of the best days of the administration in this country. And you have associated with him a man whom to New Yorkers I need not further describe than to say his hame is Levi P. Morton. [Applause.]

A man of most generous character, of intelligent comprehension of the affairs, of the widest and most statesmanlike views on all public questions pending before the American people. Against this you have two gentlemen of which I would not speak in terms other than those of entire personal respect. Of their Vice-Presidential candidate I have a friend of many years standing, and I am a personal admirer of Judge Thurman. But I beg you to observe that at a critical period in this country the Vice-President, George M. Dallas, in a casting vote in a tied Senate destroyed the protective tariff of 1842. If you do not prevent them Mr. Thurman will be in a position to reenact the vote of George M. Dallas in 1842. Therefore the more amiable and the more able a man may be, the worse will be his influence before the American people. [Applause.]

Irish American's Welcome to Mr Blaine

NEW YORK, August 10.—The Irish American Anti-Free Trade League, by ex-Judge Morrison, presented the following to Mr. Blaine:

Hon. James G. Blaine:

DEAR AND HONORDED SR:—In the name of the Irish-American Anti-Free Trade League, composed of thirty clubs in the city f New York and numerous othersin the adjoining States, and in concet with our fellow citizens throughut the Union, we tender you a pnuine heartfelt, Irish "Ceade mille filthe" (a hundred thousand welcome) back again to the great people wo love you so well for the friends and enemies you have made.

Your friends are the frieds of America, your enemies are hr enemies. You have just causeto be proud of both. In the grandeur of supreme self-denial you have set aside the greatest honor the world could bestow upon you. Reluctntly, very reluctantly, we bowed toyour decision to decline leading the opponents of English Free Trade; towhat we are firmly convinced will be a glorious and decisive victory but we rejoice in the knowledge of the fact that your incomparable abilities will be exercised to the utmost to secure the election of our standard bearers, Benjamin Harrison and Levi P. Morton, and we hereby invite you to address the members of our League and their friends at any time during the campaign which may suit your convenience.

Humbly thanking the God of our fathers for having preserved you and yours from all the perils of the great deep, and assuring you that language utterly fails to express our admiration and affection for you, we once more repeat our hearts' fondest welcome home.

On behalf of the league:

P. H. MCNAMA,
President.

A. L. MORRISON,
Chairman of the Executive Com.

Our Ancient Foe and Free Trade.

It is comical to note the way the Cleveland organs are endeavoring to make it appear that England is not interested in the success of the Free Trade movement in this country. Some of them are even trying to prove that Free Trade would injure instead of help England. It will be remembered that the Anglo-maniac who is our Minister to England made the same assertion. This is, perhaps, the most foolish line of argument the Free Tradeers have yet adopted. If they had stopped to reffect for a moment they would have seen that they could never persuade the country that the Mugwumps and the Anglomaniacs would support any movement that would injure England, the land of their love. The very fact that these denationalized Americans are anti-Protectionists is prima facie evidence that Free Trade will be beneficial to England.

But we are not confined to this kind of evidence. The English press, before it was warned to be more cautious, did not attempt to conceal its joy over the work that Cleveland and his fellow Free Traders are engaged in. A few days after Cleveland's Free Trade Message appeared the London Colliery Guardian hailed it as a god-send to the British iron trade. "No event of greater magnitude," it said, "has occurred in the iron, steel, and mining industries for a long time past than the proposal which is now made to effect a radical change in the fiscal policy of the United States. America has been of immense value as a market to the trade of this country. The effect which, on iron and steel-making, the bare possibility even of the admittance of raw material free of duty, together with reductions in the duties on some descriptions of iron and steel, has produced on some of our exchanges is a portent in itself. If President Cleveland should be able to carry out his plan for admission into America free of duty one of the first effects which would be produced on the English iron trade would be the transference of the enormous stocks of pig-iron in the Scotch and English markets to the United States. The iron ore mines of Lancashire and West Cumberland would be certain to do a greatly enlarged trade with the United States."

This was the way the London Colliery Guardian spoke when Cleveland's Free Trade Message first made its appearance. A month later it was still harping on the great things that might be expected from the Free Trade propaganda inaugurated by Cleveland. In January it informed its readers that "President Cleveland, in his address to the American Congress, has laid open a very fair field in connection with the export trade, and if, with the import duties of last year, we were able to send consignments of coal and iron to America, it is only reasonable to suppose that if the President's Message is adopted and the duties removed we may find a far larger opening in the American continent than ever has been known before." The English trade organ that gave exgression to these views knew what it was talking about. It was not indulging in any theory, but dealing with facts with which it was thoroughly conversant.

While the London Colliery Guardian was rejoicing over the advantages the British iron trade would derive from the adoption of Cleveland's policy, other British journals were indulging in similar rejoicings over the services rendered England by Grover Cleveland. The People's Journal, published in Dundee, Scotland, said of his Message: "The change in the American fiscal policy will be benefical to the country, and the prospect of it has diffused fresh hope throughout business circles in this city." Another Scotch paper, the Haddingtonshire Courier, added its testimony to the benefits Cleveland's policy would confer on Great Britain:—"We may look," it said, "to an impetus being given to our home markets that will go far to make up for the depression of late years." The Scotchman declared that "Free importation of iron, coal, and wood would be a great boom to British producers." We might go on quoting from the London Times, London Daily News, the Saturday Review, and a host of English journals.

When we confront the testimony of these organs of English opinion with the assertions of the Clevelandites in regard to the probable effect of Free Trade, we can be in little doubt as to who will get the milk of the free trade cocoanut. The gigantic conspiracy against American industries that has been conceived and carried out in the interest of British manufactures cannot be crowned without the aid of Irish-American voters. Without their co-operation the Free-Trade party in the North is doomed to a disastrous defeat.

Let us hope that the statement made by the London Times, when it declared that "The only time England can use the Celt is when he emigrates to America and votes for Free Trade," will not be verified this year. It is time we cease prostituting the ballot in England a service. We have given proof of our devotion to the Republic by shedding our blood in many a battlefield in defence of American institutions. We have now the opportunity of showing our loyalty in peace as we did in war. We are called upon to fight the secret conspiracy against America with our ballats as we fought open rebellion with our bullets.—Irish World.

The Indiana Outlook.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 12.—Speaking of the prospects of the Indiana election, Representative Cheadle says: "From my knowledge of the State and the evident drift of sentiment our way, I am confident that General Hovey will be elected by not less than 10,000. We could not have nominated a stronger man. Hovey is large-hearted, and he has been the life-loag friend of the common people. He is a native Hoosier and a soldier of two wars, He won the battle of Champion Hills by leading a bayonet charge with 5,000 men. At Resaca he led another bayonet charge that swept the enemy from his front. Gen. Gresham was wounded under his command. He commanded 19,000 Indiana soldiers in one battle, and has comrades in every county in the State, who respect him as an able officer and honorable comrade. He has had large experiences in public affairs. He has been Circuit and Supreme Judge, Major General of Volunteers, Minister to Peru and in 1886 was elected to the Fiftieth Congress by more than 1,000 votes in a district that was overwhelmingly Democratic. His course here will command the respect of all soldiers and laborers of the State. There are not less than 70,000 old soldiers in the State, 20,000 of whom are Democrats, and this vote will double the result in November."

Would be Glad to Change the Issue.

The week opens gloomily for the managers of the Democratic campaign. They have just found out that the intelligent wage-earners were fairly represented by the thousands of enthusiastic supporters of Harrison, Morton and Protection whose mottoes and banners in the great Republican parade last Thursday showed such a clear understanding of the great issue of this campaign, which is mainly one between high and low, American and foreign wages. An army with such banners may well be terrible to the Democratic managers, who had been unduly elated by the immensity of their campaign fund, between the $250,000 promised by the "Sugar Trust," for special favors granted by Mr. Mills and his co-parceners, the much larger amount certain to come from the "Whiskey Trust," and the immense contributions also sure to come from the banded liquor interests.

But if intelligent labor has discovered the real issue and is mustering unintelligent labor on the American high wages platform, of what avail will be all the promised campaign funds for the election of Mr. Cleveland on his own Free Trade issue? That is the query which has taken life and hope out of the able managers of the campaign for Free Trade.

It is the evident and general uprising of labor in behalf of the system of Protection, in this section, that has moved the practical Chairman of the Democratic National Executive Committee to talk freely for publication to a correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer, Mr. W. C. McBride, and in a tone indicating the desperation he feels unless the issue is changed. In the course of this conversation, in response to a suggestion as to the passage of a Senate Tariff bill, Col. Brice showed the extremity of his desire for a change of the issue on which his campaign is already a failure, when he replied that "in that case there is but one thing for the Democrats of the House to do, and that is to pass the Senate bill, no matter what it may be. This would put the Democracy in the position of having made an honest endeavor to revise the Tariff and reduce the surplus of revenues. It would put the Republicans of the Senate in the position of having failed to appreciate its duty. But if the Democrats accept even the Senate bill, it will show a disposition on their part to take half a loaf rather than get nothing at all. Further, it will shift the responsibility upon the Republicans, and relieve the Democrats. Such a proceeding as I have outlined would change the phase of the canvass with respect to the Tariff."

This is a most important revelation. In alluding to this interview the Sun suggests that the conversation reported was supposed to have been confidential, but that, even if it was, the correspondent was justified in giving to the public the confessions of Col. Brice and Col. W. L. Brown, as to the hopelessness of a Democratic campaign, with the Mills bill as the main issue, on account of "the service he"—Mr. McBride—"renders to the party by calling attention to the state of affairs and thus awakening Democrats from the illusions of slumberland."

Those who know best the real sentiments of the most practical and ablest of the managers of the Democratic campaign need not to be informed that the latter would jump at any chance for changing or modifying the Tariff issue, as it is now understood by the ablest of the representatives of protected labor. But will Mr. Cleveland or will Mr. Mills encourage any sort of change of front in the face of a Republican party that is united, full of fight and vigor and gaining new recruits by the thousand every hour!

In fact, at the close of the interview, which is exciting such interest, Col. Brice is reported as telling Mr. John C, New that his party had an advantage over the Democrats in that "you have a candidate who helps himself," a remarkable and sincere compliment from an enemy, which Gen. Harrison's tact, sagacity and boldness in leading his own campaign has amply justified. It was, also, and more especially, a backhanded blow at the obstinacy and obtuseness of Col. Brice's candidate, who seems determined to fight out the campaign in his own way and on his own issue.

Will the Democratic managers scare their candidate into taking the back track on the Tariff issue? If so, he could be very effectually cartooned by an illustration of the old story about the Scotchman who caught a thieving neighbor astraddle of the orchard fence, in the height of the apple season. "Whaur ye goin', Sandy?" was the loud query. "Bock agen," was the quick answer, as Sandy dropped to the ground. The Democratic managers would be very glad to slip "bock agen" to their old meaningless generalties about the "Tariff Reform." But will their master let them?—N. N. Mail and Express.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Aug. 13, 1888.—Senator Edmunds offered a resolution in the Senate Friday, directing the Attorney General to transmit copies of correspondence between the Department of Justice and any Government officer in the State of New York since the 1st of Januasy, 1888, on the subject of registration or election. The object of this resolution is to get at the authority for the recent orders issued to the United States Chief Supervisor of elections for New York, to the effect that his deputies would only be allowed pay for five days work this year. The law distinctly says that ten days may be consumed in this work, and Senator Edmunds means to find out why this was changed by Democratic officials.

The funeral of General Sheridan took place Saturday morning, and was attended by all the prominent people in the city. The departments were all closed, and neither House of Congress was in session. He was buried in Arlington cemetery.

"Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." Cleveland is very mad with the Democratic National Committee, because they are unable to perform impossibilities. He blames the committee for the lack of enthusiasm in his party. How any enthusiasm can be expected with Cleveland as a candidate, and free trade as a platform, is more than can be seen with the ordinary eye.

Senator Blair has introduced a bill which provides for preliminary negotiations toward annexing Canada to the United States, with the consent of England. It is hardly probable that the bill will be passed at this session of Congress, nevertheless it is creating much talk. Public opinion on this Canadian question can hardly be said to have crystalized sufficiently to indicate upon which side it is.

Fourteen more private pension bills were vetoed last week by Senator Blair's "pig-headed executive," but he has not yet given out his letter of acceptance.

Senator Frye, who is in charge of the fisheries treaty, is anxious to bring the treaty to a vote, and has given notice that beginning with today he proposes to press it, to the exclusion of all other business, until it is settled. The Democratic Senators, who have indulged in some vague threats of filibustering in order to prevent a vote, will hardly dare to execute their threats, as filibustering is a two-edged sword that is dangerous.

Senator Stewart has given notice that after the fisheries treaty is disposed of, he will press his bill for the admission of the State of Washington.

There is a deficiency of $250,000 in the railway mail transportation fund of the Postoffice Department. That's a specimen of Democratic economy and reform.

A committee of the executive board of the Merchant Tailors' National Exchange, which was in session here last week, was given a hearing by the Senate finance committee. They want the duty on ready made clothing raised. They say that under the present tariff, a wealthy man can go to London and for $500 have clothes made that would cost him $1,000 in the United States.

Senator Sherman has sent a circular to Republican Senators, asking each if there are any measures pending before the Senate, in which he is specially interested, and upon which he desires action by the Senate during the present session. The object of the circular is to get the calendar cleared as far as possibe, before the Senate begins consideration of the tariff bill.

Senator Stewart's Chinese bill passed the Senate without a division, and Representative Morrow attempted to get it up in the House, but owing to objections on the Democratic side, it was referred to the committee on foreign relations, with authority to report it at any time.

The Senate has passed a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Interior for information concerning his recent decision affecting the title to Northern Pacific Railroad lands.

A committee representing 19,000 hatters in five states, were before the Senate finance committee last week, asking for further protection for their craft.

The impression is growing among Democrats in Congress that their national committee represents too many railroads.

A bill has been introduced in the Senate giving Mrs. Sheridan a $5,000 pension.

Mr. Cleveland eased his conscience, and kept his political promises, by allowing the river and harbor bill to become a law without his signature

Mountain Lake Park.

On Wednesday morning Rev. Smith gave his excellent lecture on Dives and Lazarus. Then in the evening Rev. J. St. Clair Neal gave a splendid lecture on The Pharoahs of the Bondage and the Exodus.

At eleven o'clock next morning Rev. W. H. Withrow, of Canada, gave his first lecture on The Catacombs of Rome. In the evening Rev. C. W. Baldwin gave a very interesting illustrated lecture on Alaska, bringing in occasionally in a very pleasing way several of the splendid views of our Park.

On Friday at eleven o'clock Dr. Withrow gave his second and last lesture on the Catacombs of Rome. His lectures were very instructive, proving in many ways the truths of the Bible. In the evening Rev. Geo. Elliot, of Washington, gave his excellent lecture on Moonshine.

Saturday being Recognition Day, was a very busy one. After the examination of the normal class the C. L. S. C. commencement exercises were held. At the close of the addresses the graduates received their diplomas. At seven-thirty a grand concert was commenced which lasted until nearly ten o'clock. At the close of this the camp fire was lighted, corn roasted and the grounds illuminated by Japanese lanterns. Grace Cottage was also beautifully illuminated. For this occasion the B. & O. run special trains from Grafton and Cumberland, bringing quite a number of excursionist. These trains returned between ten and eleven o'clock Saturday night.

After an hour spent in testimony meeting Sabbath morning, the Rev. Dennis Osborne, a native of India, preached a most excellent sermon on "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power." At two-thirty Dr. Baldwin conducted the Sunday School. At its close Rev. Mr. McGrue gave a short address. Then Mr. Osborne and his son Earnest sang in the Hindoostanee language. Earnest sings beautifully, both in his native and the English tongue. At night the anniversary of the woman's Foreign Missionory Society was held conducted by Miss Isabel Hart, of Baltimore. There were six persons on the rostrum who sang a hymn in the Hindoostanee language. The collection amounted to over one hundred dollars.

The entire day Monday was devoted to Woman's Work, not only in the various missionary foreign fields, but at home as well. One of the most prominent features was the office of Deaconess in the M. E. Church, as authorized by the last General Conference. After the speaking in the evening Earnest Osborne appeared in his native costume and sang beautifully, playing or beating the tambourine, his father accompanying him striking the cymbals.

Many have returned to their homes but others are coming.

Mrs. Scott and children came last week from Ohio. Also Mr. Spangler and family.

Mr. A. B. Crane and family came last evening from Baltimore.

The camp-meeting begins next Tuesday. A very large attendance is expected. J. A. E.

Elkins.

Mr. C. E. Hilleary, whose store was nearly swept away by the high waters, has sold his stock of goods to Mr. J. E. Shrout, who now stands behind the counter, ever ready to accommodate his customers. We are sorry to lose Mr. H. from our town. He is a staunch young Republican and a clever fellow.

Messrs, W, H. Hull & Bro., of Frederick county, Va., have moved to Elkins to engage in the mercantile business, and are putting in a large stock of goods in the Faherty store house.

Mr. W. R. Neville has been appointed post master, as successor to Mr. J. H. Beckman, who has resigned. We learn that Mr. Beckman has his store about completed at Parsons, W. Va., and will shortly move thither. We will all miss Mr. B. and his noble lady very much.

Miss Maud Savage, of Sang Run, is visiting her sister, Mrs. G. W. Moon.

Mr. Graham, of Baltimore, gave us a bible reading service on Sunday night. A heavy storm prevented many from attending, but the occasion was enjoyed by those present. Mr. Graham will give us another service next Sunday night.

Speedy action should be taken towards repairing our iron bridge, which was nearly destroyed by the late flood; as a long delay will be much more expensive.

Republicans in this section seem to be unanimously in favor of Mr. McComas being his own successor.

Excursions to Cincinnati.

Every Thursday until August 30th, inclusive, the Baltimore and Ohio R. R. Co. will sell excursion tickets to Cincinnati from all points on its lines east of the Ohio River, at rate of one and one-third fares for the round trip. Tickets will be valid for return passage for 15 days, including day of alse.

The Issue in a Nutshell.

The platform just adopted by the Michigan Republicans puts in this forcible shape the issue of tariff-revision and revenue reduction:

"We believe in a reduction of the increasing surplus and national revenues to governmental requirements by an American Protective and Republican system, and not by an English Free Trade and Democrati system."

Republican County Convention.

Cumberland News, Wednesday.

The Republican county convention to select delegates to the Rockville Congressional convention, August 23, met at Miller's Hall yesterday. Caucusing beforehand developed the fact that Mr. Wellington's friends had 8 districts and Mr. McComas' 8, leaving out No. 18 (Vale Summit) the admission of which was to be contested. Three of the five delegates from No. 16, North Branch, were unexpectedly found to be for McComas. The Wellington men had the fullest delgations and by adopting the individual method of voting, they succeeded in controlling the convention. A number of the McComas men left the hall near the close of the proceedings, but there was no "bolt."

The McComas men who retired took no seperate action and will make no contest, Both they and their friends who remained in the convention, complained bitterly of the treatment they had received in being rendered powerless by the unexpected suspension of the unit rule and adoption of the ludividual method of voting. They represented as many districts as their opponents and claim to represent 500 more Republican votes and hence think they should have had more say in convention.

The contest in yesterday's convention and its result demonstrated the fact that a change in the method of representation is badly needed. The plan of voting by districts has prevailed so long that delegations have contracted the habit of sending only a portion of their membership to cast the vote. If a system were adopted whereby it was understood that districts shall cast the number of individual votes to which they are entitled, no more and no less, this representation being proportioned to the Republican vote cast, such proceedings as yesterday's would not happen. There should be a definite rule laid down, however, so that delegates may know what to expect. The unit rule ought not prevail at one time and individual representation at another. The party managers should look to it.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

CUMBERLAND, MD., Aug. 14.—There were some lively proceedings in the Republican county convention here to-day to select delegates for the Congressional convention at Rockville August 23. It was ascertained this morning that the majority of delegates from district No. 16, which had been supposed to be for Wellington, were for McComas, and this gave McComas and Wellington eight votes each, with another district for McComas contested. The Wellington districts had the fullest representation, and they controlled the convention by deciding at the outset to vote by delegates instead of districts, as heretofore customary. They decided by a vote of 38 to 32 to vote by delegates on temporary chairman, and elected D. W. Sloan, a Wellington man, chairman by the same vote. The committe on credentials were unable to agree on a report, and after a two hours' session came out and announced that they could not agree because of the dispute as to district number sixteen's representation on the committee, it being claimed that owing to a misunderstanding of the chairman a man not selected by that delegation had been placed on the committee. The committee asked the appointment of a new committee, saying they had no report to make. The committee chairman, however, presented the report so far as prepared, and this was adopted by the convention after a warm discussion, in which some personalties were indulged in, The McComas men did not vote at all on the adoption of this report, Finally about half the McComas delegates left the hall, and those who remained did no more voting, though they made an effort to secure adjournment. The Wellington men then dispensed with a credentials committee and proceeded to choose, without opposition, the following delegates to Rockville: J. B. Stottlemyer, Dr. J. B. Barth, Dr. J. M. Weller, G. A. Pearee, J. W. Shuck, D. W. Sloan, Lloyd Lowndes, Thomas Johnson, G. W. Snyder, Jacob Myers, (colored,) R. S. Casey. Otto Hohing, Owen England, A. P. Gross, Chas. Forrest, A. L. Miller, Jocob Brown, R. W. McMichael. David Walker, Edward Gates, (colored.)

Resolutions were passed instructing the delegates for Wellington. The McComas men who left the convention took no seperate action, and will make no contest, though they claim the sudden departure trom the unit rule was unfair. If the voting had been by districts there would have been a tie—8 to 8. The question of admitting the contested districts was not reached, the credentials committee throwing up their job before it came up.

Resolutions of Respect to Bessie Thrasher.

WHEREAS, The great Ruler, of the universe has, in his infinite wisdom, removed from our midst our worthy and esteemed young sister, Bessie Thrasher; and

WHEREAS, The intimate relations held during her short life with this Band of Hope makes it fitting that we record our appreciation of her; therefore,

Resolved, That the wisdom and retentive memory of one so young in years, was at all times a source of pleasure to her teachers and tutors, and her apt and bright intellect was admitted by all, and especially the members of our little Band of Hope where she at all times was faithful and true, and will ever be held in grateful remembrance.

Resolved, That the sudden removal of such a child from our "Band" leaves a vacancy and shadow that will be deeply realized by all members of this Band of Hope and its friends.

Resolved, That with deep sympathy with the afflicted father, mother, brothers and sisters and relatives of the deceased, we express an earnest hope that even so great a bereavement may be overruled for their highest good; and may her short pure life be an incentive for us all to live more holy and nobler lives, and ever keep in remembrance her bright example—faithful, loving, little Bssie, farewell.

MR. DR. J. W. LAUGHLIN,
MIS ESTELLA RODEHEAVER,
W. O. HOYE,
Committee.

DEERPARK, August 11th, 1888.

The New York Tribune says of Mr. Blaine' return to this country:

Mr. Blaine's self-effacement was the most remarkable feature of his reception. No American ever received a heartier or more impressive welcome on returning to his country, and none ever succeeded in putting himself so quietly and contentedly in the backgroud. The tidings that 40,000 Republicans had been marching the previous night in honor of his coming must have fired the blood even of this veteran campaigner and leader of men; but while there was no lack of appreciation on his part of the unprecedented honors accorded to him, his first thoughts were of the gallant American soldier who has passed away while he has been at sea. The death of Sheridan was the shadow darkening the threshold of the American home to which he had returned; and he spoke of it with profound emotion and sympathy, putting out of mind the splendid tribute of respect and affection which he was himself receiving. One grateful act of self-effacement opened the way for another. In the next breath he was addressing, not the throng of political friends and ardent admirers who gathered about him to welcome him home, but the toiling millions throughout the land, whose welfare, happiness and progress are imperiled by free trade legislation. It was to them that his words of greeting and warning were spoken, and repeated with even greater emphasis in the more formal address of the evening. Mr. Blaine, like General Harrison, regards the wage question as the core of the tariff controversy. Nine-tenths of our population are dependent on some form of labor as a means of living. These wage-earners thrive and prosper as they have opportunity for employment. Protection has aided them by multiplying and diversifying industries and by rendering their labor renumerative. Free trade will stimulate the foreign supply and restrict the home demand for labor. It will degress wages and deprive thousands of American working people of their employment. This is the living issue of politics to-day, and it concerns the great mass of workers whose only capital is their labor. Mr. Blaine has landed in New York with earnest words of entreaty and warning on his lips for the humblest and poorest of his fellow-citizens. Their future is at stake in the struggle between Republicanism and Democracy. The enemies of protection are fighting the battle of European cheap labor and misery. Will American workingmen lend their support to a cause that is fatal to their interests? The appeal, as Mr. Blaine says, lies with them.

The Big Log Raft.

NEW YORK, Aug. 12.—The big log raft which started from Joggins, N. S., on the 1st inst, has been safely landed at New York, having been pulled through Hell Gate on Saturday by six tugs. The Joggins, as the raft is called, is cigar shaped and 592 feet in length, or about forty feet longer than the City of New York. It is twice as large as the first great raft and 100 feet longer than the ill-fated Leary raft of last year, which went to pieces at sea. The Joggin's width of beam is fifty-three feet, and she draws twenty-three feet of water. There are in the Joggins 21,500 trees, of an average length of thirty-eight feet. This would give a total of about 3,000,000 feet of lumber. The cost of transportation at the regular rate of $1.25 a stick would amount to about $30,000. The raft is equal to about forty-five schooner loads of lumber.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted at the Montgomery county Republican Convention, Aug. 13th, 1888:

WHEREAS, Observations of the results in other Congressional districts and our own experience in the last five years have demonstrated to our satisfaction that those Districts which having secured an earnest and able representative have continuously returned him to Congress, exercise a controlling influence on Legislation; and,

WHEREAS, Our present representative by his course in Congress has won for himself a national reputation as an able and fearless supporter of true Republicanism; therefore,

Resolved, That we cordially and enthusiastically endorse Hon. L. E. McComas for re-nomination as our representative in the Fifty-first Congress.

Resolved, That our delegates this day elected be instructed to use all honorable means to secure the renomination of Hon. L. E. McComas.

Cleveland and the Tories.

PITTSBURGH, PA., August 13.—"Grover Cleveland is the British candidate for the Presidency of the United States and nothing can wipe that fact out." The speaker was Murat Halstead, the editor of the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette, who had stopped off in Pittsburgh this morning just long enough to get breakfast, on his way home from the Blaine reception in New York.

"He goes hand in hand with the Tories, and is seeking to turn the United States over to England," continued Mr. Halstead. "But his power to do harm will soon be at an end. Benjamin Harrison will take up the reins of Government next March and give the country a safe administration without the fears of an introduction of British free trade. In the East everything points to Republican success in November, and the Empire State will vote for Harrison and Morton sure; they understand the issue of the hour and will flock to a man under the banner of Protection. Already the Democratic managers recognize this fact, and are squirming under it. They are using every effort to counteract the effect of Cleveland's cowboy message, but all to no avail. They are trying to get Grover to hedge in his letter of acceptance, but it is too late. Mills has already read the first chapter of the President's letter, and Grover will have to finish it in the same strain in which it was commenced. His tariff reform followers are known and understood. In fact he is already on record on all the subjects of the hour.

Speaking about the outlook in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, Mr. Halstead said he thought the Republicans would carry the three States with something to spare and that they have a fighting chance of capturing West Virginia also. As for Ohio, he says it is too early to give any figures, but that it will go Republican by a substantial majority. Referring to the Blaine reception he said: "Mr. Blaine was given a royal welcome back to America. He made two of his usually brilliant addresses in New York, both of which I heard, and in both of which he struck the key-note of the campaign,

Sheridan Now at Rest.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 11.—The last rites for the dead were to-day performed according to the ordinances of the Roman Catholic Church for Phillip Henry Sheridan, General of the army of the United States, and his body was laid to rest in beautiful Arlington, the city of the soldier dead. The event was marked by a general suspension of public business. The ceremonies throughout were in keeping with the character of the man. The strict adherence to an almost unmilitary simplicity in all the arrangements, the heavy-wheeled artillery caisson for his hearse, the procession of a single thousand erect and sturdy soldiers who had seen service, best fitted the closing scenes in the life of so great a soldier.

Blaine's Welcome.

Philadelphia Press.

The procession in New York last night lacked its chief object and end, but the presence of the thousands who composed it and the tens of thousands who gathered to cheer shows the hold which a great leader has on a party whose principles and policy he represents and voices even when he no longer holds office or place and exercises his influence by virtue of his grasp of public questions and his power to present them. For such a man, place and position are a mere accident; he, himself, his acts and his utterances give him his real commission and furnish his true influence.

Such influence Mr. Blaine exercises, present or absent. He is not the first and will not be the last in the history of American parties who has enjoyed this unrivaled and untrammeled supremacy over a great political organization; but he is the first, and, human nature being what it is, may easily be the last so to use and exercise this power as to subordinate his personal weight and influence to the choice of another candidate by his party, and exercise all his power of conviction and leadership to win for another the great prize of American public life.

Scoff and sneer over the procession last night and the welcome to-day fleck the Democratic press of the land, but not a man in all the land, Democrat or Republican, but knows that the victory is more certain and success surer for Benjamin Harrison and the Republican party because for three months to come the presence and the power of this great leader of men, the inspiration of his party and the foremost American of the day, will be enlisted in the great struggle for Protection and equal rights.

ONLY THE BRAVE.

There once was a maid of sixteen,
Who in love had as yet never been,
Neither tinker nor tailor,
Nor soldier nor sailor,
Could win her affections, I ween.

All lawyers she strongly despised,
And clergymen ne'er recognized,
Author, artist and actor,
Poet, doctor had lack'd her
Affection, which many men prized.

It was currently rumored she said
That the fortunate man she would wed
Must be brave as a lion,
So she could rely on
His courage as well as his head.

All soldiers she look'd on with scorn,
Even those who in battle were torn,
For she said they were proud
Of the gaze of the crowd,
And the tunics and belts they had worn.

But one day at a ball game she met
An umpire, whose name I forget,
And she thought him so brave
She her heart and hand gave,
And I don't think that either regret!

RIVAL LOVERS.

The Compact Between Ben Button and Zip Tifkins.

"Now that we understand each other, let us shake hands and be friends."

"That's it."

Their hands met in a firm grasp.

They looked into each other's faces, one with a merry twinkle in his eye and a broad smile over his jovial features; the other, with a glance long drawn out, grave and solemn, that seemed to cast a shadow of gloom on every thing about the scene.

"You'll do your best, and I'll do my best. That's what we've agreed on, ain't it, Zip Tifkins?"

"That's it, Ben Button, and whichever of us wins the other shall bear no ill-will."

"Just so, Zip."

"And every thing except murder shall be counted fair."

"Eh?"

"And murder, too, if you are willing to take the consequences."

"Say, Zip, hold on!"

"So if I should put you out of my way right here," continued Zip, without seeming to notice the interruption, and drawing a small pistol out of his boot-leg as he spoke, "and it would never be found out on me, why it would be all right."

"But, Zip, say——"

"Or if it were found out," Zip still continued, raising the pistol higher and higher till it pointed straight for Ben's breast, "and I were willing to take all the risk to get clear, which I think I am ready to do, why that, too, would be all right."

"Hello! Ben, where are you going?" shouted Zip, as the former turned and ran down the road at what seemed to be almost breakneck speed, frequently casting scared and anxious glances behind him.

Ben, however, did not stop to answer, but kept straight on until he was lost to sight in a bend in the road, while Zip, bending almost double with laughter, sent peal after peal of merriment ringing out on the balmy evening air.

"Of all the chickens in christendom Ben Button takes the worm!" cried Zip, a broad grin still on his face, as he also turned and walked away.

Zip Tifkins, full of life, fun and frolic, had for the last few weeks been playing rival to Ben Button in the affections of Melinda Spratt. Ben was seriously in love with Melinda; Melinda's young heart was fond of Zip, and Zip, homeless, careless, fun-loving rover that he was, had never a thought that reached into the future for an hour.

Ben and Zip had met in the road accidentally. Ben was on his way to the Spratt homestead to lay further siege to Melinda's heart.

For the last few days Ben had had but one thought, and that was how to get rid of Zip as a rival. So, when he met Zip, he pleaded from the fulness of his heart, and in the most persuasive language he could command, that Zip would relinquish all claim to Melinda's heart and hand.

Zip, in pure fun, feigned love also, and with well-assumed earnestness tried in turn to prevail upon Ben to withdraw from the race. Neither, however, would give in. As a last resort they finally agreed that each should, in a fair, friendly way, be permitted to plead his own cause with Melinda, and let her decide.

With Zip, so far, it was only a good joke, and as such he had made the most of it, as has been seen.

Ben Button with regularity spent two evenings of the week at the Spratt domicile. With Melinda he made very slow, if any, progress into favor; with Mrs. Spratt, however, he won golden opinions and stood in high grace.

Since the compact between Ben and Zip the latter had visited Melinda but once, and then she had, in a very shy and sweet way, teasingly upbraided him for having tried to take the life of her constant admirer, Ben Button.

"And would it break your heart, Melinda, if he were to die?" asked Zip, with an eager undertone in his voice, watching her face closely.

"It would—almost—of course, if—but Zip, you have no right to ask such questions," she answered, looking up shyly and blushing.

"Well, you needn't be uneasy about him. I wouldn't hurt Ben Button by a single thought or word, much less take his life," replied Zip, with an earnestness unusual with him.

"I was only joking, Zip. But you seem to be awfully in earnest and solemn this evening. What is ailing you, anyway?"

"Nothing much, only I have made up my mind to go away," answered Zip, looking aside.

"Go away?"

"Yes, Melinda."

"Where are you going?"

"Anywhere. It makes no difference, so I get away."

"And ain't you coming back?"

"Some day, maybe, if I ever get to be of any account to myself or anybody else."

"You are of some account now, Zip, and you had better stay right where you are."

"No; I've made up my mind to go, and I am sure it is the best thing that could happen for us all around, so I'll stick to it," said Zip, resolutely.

Melinda was looking out of the window. When she saw a man coming up the lane toward the house, and recognized in the comer Ben Button, a shadow of annoyance flitted over her face.

Zip had been watching Melinda, and when he saw the slight frown on her face, he, too, glanced out, and seeing who was coming he rose to his feet ready to depart, saying. "I'll call in again before I leave, and tell you all good-by. Good evening."

Melinda glanced reproachfully after the retreating Zip. There was a suspicion of tears in her eyes, and a little quiver around her mouth, as she murmured to herself: "Fool Zip! He is going away because he thinks I am going to marry that hateful Ben Button, and is jealous. But I can't make him see, and I won't ask him to stay. I'll die first. There!"

The truth was that a serious thought had at last come to Zip. He was in love, and he knew it. He had looked at himself as in a looking glass, and found out his own worthlessness. More than that, he had determined to go away, change his habits of shiftlessness, and become a useful man and citizen. He would not ask Melinda for her love until he had made himself worthy of it. If, however, in the meantime some other man—Ben Button, perhaps—stepped in ahead of him, why, he would still be the gainer by an ambition for higher things which, in an indirect way, would be a gift from Melinda.

That evening, Ben Button asked Melinda to become his wife; but she was in no mood to answer him then, for Zip's foolish determination to go away troubled her in no small degree. She knew, too, that her mother favored Ben above any one else, and that she would be grieved if Ben received a curt refusal, so she told him she would have an answer ready for him when he should call again, and Ben was happy.

Days passed away. They were days of hope to Ben, days of doubt and irresolution to Melinda, and busy days for hand and thought with Zip.

The decisive evening came at last, and Ben was on hand with his usual clockwork regularity to receive what he fully expected to be a favorable answer to his suit.

It had been a rainy day, but the sun had broken through the clouds in the evening, and was setting bright and clear, casting its last rays upon Mrs. Spratt, Melinda and Ben Button, as they sat on the west gallery of the house.

"I declare, Melinda," said Mrs. Spratt suddenly, "if them well-diggers haven't gone off and forgot to shut the gap in the fence around the well."

"And there is Blossie's calf in the yard now, and going straight for the well. I'll go and shut up the gap, mother; you sit still," said Melinda, as Mrs. Spratt was about to rise.

Melinda ran toward the well, heading the calf off at the same time. She was about to close the gap in the fence, when her eyes fell upon the wide opening in the ground. She hesitated a moment, then entered the gap, and approached the well cautiously. On the brink, she peered over and looked into depth below. She was about to withdraw again, but the ground under her feet gave way, and with a loud scream she was hurled to the bottom of the well.

Mrs. Spratt and Ben saw what happened, for their eyes had fondly followed Melinda in her every movement, and they now rushed to the scene of the catastrophe.

Stepping carefully upon some planks that were lying across the opening of the well, they peered into the abyss below them. There was no sound except of crumbling earth and pebbles falling from the sides of the well. The earth was loose from the rain during the day, and the break where Melinda had fallen in had started the walls to caving all around.

Then a large mass of earth fell crashing to the bottom of the well and laid bare a huge bowlder hanging as if ready to topple the next moment.

A faint moan from the bottom of the well reached the ears of those above.

"O, Ben, she is alive! Save her! save her!" cried Mrs. Spratt.

"I can't, Mrs. Spratt. That rock in the side of the well will fall in directly," whined Ben.

"O, save her, Ben! I'll lower you down with the windlass and hoist you out again," pleaded Mrs. Spratt.

"'Tain't no use. That rock will tumble in in a minute," still moaned Ben.

Just then Zip, with head bent, came walking toward the house. Mrs. Spratt saw him and called out to him excitedly: "Zip! Zip! come quick, and save Melinda."

Zip heard and did not lose a moment in running to the well.

He took in the situation at once. With all speed possible he unwound the rope from the windlass, and after telling Mrs. Spratt and Ben to stand ready to hoist, went down in the well, hand over hand, on the rope.

The earth was still falling, striking the bottom with a hollow sound, when Zip with a lusty shout told them to hoist away.

Melinda was landed above ground at last, bleeding, bruised and unconscious. The rope was lowered again, and just as Zip's head was above ground, the large rock in the side of the well and masses of earth from all around crumbled in, and fell with a sound as of thunder to the bottom of the well.

It was a narrow escape.

Melinda was carried to the house, and a doctor was sent for. Before he arrived, however, she regained consciousness, and seeing Zip bending over her, a glad smile lighted up her fair young face, while she murmured: "Don't go away, Zip. Don't go away."

Just then Mrs. Spratt, accompanied by the doctor, entered the room and approached the bed. When the good mother saw the smile on her daughter's face, and Zip bending low above the pillow, glad tears came to her eyes, and her voice was low and tender.

"You can kiss her, Zip, if you want to," she said.

Zip did "want to," and kissed Melinda on her smiling lips.

Then Mrs. Spratt put her arms around Zip's neck and kissed him, too, and told him that he must leave the room while the doctor attended to Melinda's hurts, which, upon examination, proved to be mere bruises after all.

Ben hung around the house for awhile, but when he saw that he was left out in the cold by everybody even by Mrs. Spratt, he thought it best to go.—John P. Sjolander, in N. O. Times-Democrat.

ALL ABOUT KISSING.

A Dissertation for the Silly Season from a Learned Authority.

De Levis calls a kiss the door that opens the citadel to the heart, and poets and people of all ages have found mysterious virtue, bitter-sweet, magic and elixirs, and lotions of greater or less potency, but the acme of human happiness, wrote a poetess, is that we may kiss whom we please and please whom we kiss.

A kiss to be a success, must have mutual interest; there must be a reciprocity in the operation, or somebody suffers the punishment of disgust. Kissing an unwilling pair of lips is as mean a victory as robbing a bird's nest, and kissing too willing ones is about as unfragrant a pastime as making bouquets out of dandelions.

At the start the average man makes a botch of kissing. The beauty of a kiss lies in its impulsiveness and its impressibility; nor is it possible to make the first one too brief. There is danger in the attempt to make the initial kiss complete. The girl won't have it. There is too much audacious avarice about it. The thing to do is to go at the fair creature's lips slowly, so as not to frighten her; it is to be expected that she will draw them away from the point of attack, but instead of retreat the thing for heroism to do is to kiss her on some place—on the cheek, the temple, behind the ear or on the hair. A woman's fancies are as branching as the trees of a forest, and however unsatisfactory to the swain the misplaced kiss may have been, it will, if left to itself, make the recipient wondrous indulgent next time. She will caress the spot where your lips have been, look at the place through a hand-glass, and dream of the one who placed it there. When sufficient progress has been made in love-making to warrant the ideal kiss, take it methodically, with both hands, and "the gentle touch that love can teach." Let the left arm go about—not her neck to wrinkle a crepelisse ruche—but about her shoulders. Take her chin in the right hand, allowing the three fingers to touch the pretty white throat, holding the face with the thumb and forefinger, which will form a sort of vise for love's conquest. Move her head to one love's conquest. Move her head to one side and a little backward, and, approaching so as to make the quartet of lips describe the diameters of an imaginary square, kiss her twice—the second double the length of its short predecessor. This double kiss is a clew to a man's culture. Only the uncouth, ill-bred lover kisses as he learned to count—by units. The gentleman who has had the good fortune to be born in an atmosphere of refinement makes a duet of his first and final salutation, whatever may be the numerical value of the intermediates. The well-bred girl wants short, sharp, snapping kisses, that pop inaudibly, but still pop. A kiss on the hair is the kiss of a poet; tenderness is implied when the lips press the eyelids; reverence is spoken when the brow is caressed and protecting love when the cheek is empearled.

Nothing can sanctify a kiss but love, without which the sweetest lips are unsavory and unwholesome.—London Saturday Review.

NURSING NERVES.

How to Control Temper and Preserve Presence of Mind.

A term of less than half a year as attendant in an insane asylum teaches a person how to control temper, apply tact and preserve presence of mind to such an extent as to give that person great command over one whose nervous system is broken down, although the sanity be unimpaired, and whose condition requires perhaps more care, and certainly induces about as much suffering as any other. Among the first things to be learned by one who has the care of such a person is the cultivation of cheerfulness, of never looking on the dark side of any thing, and of always being able to explain untoward incidents in a fortunate way. No matter how irritating the sufferer may be, it is always to be remembered that he is a sufferer, one as painfully diseased as if the disease were in a specific spot, and, like fever and rash and fractures, visible in its effects to the naked eye.

Thorough neatness is another requisite in the nurse, the sense of smell being more acute than ever with the nervous, and the eye also being pleased with cleanliness and order; and meanwhile every motion of the nurse should be as gentle and as noiseless as a cat's feet are among china. Absolute firmness combined with gentleness is always desirable, for the patient must yield where it is necessary; but the nurse, if possible, must act as if she, and not the patient, were yielding, although in matters not vital to safety the idiosyncrasies, the fancies and dislikes, of the patient are to be regarded. Interest in the patient and sincere piety are excellently soothing to sick nerves; yet one must use discretion about it, and not go so far in the expression of pity as to arouse the patient's self-pity perceptibly. The sufferer, too, should always be encouraged to expect a favorable turn to illness and a definite recovery, for the expectation aids the cure. Always hope and never fear should be taught. So powerful is the will that, by holding it in play, it can even make death easier than it otherwise might be, although death seldom terminates nervous disease. The sufferer should always be entertained as pleasantly as possible in any way that is not exciting, but never should be treated to recitals of any thing sad, the bright side of the world being always kept in view, since darkness comes only too often and too surely to the worn-out nerves, and the duty of every one brought into contact with them is to give at least no occasion for gloom. It is, indeed, less exhausting to nurse a bad case of typhoid fever than a case of disordered nerves; the exertion is scarcely more, and it is over in a fixed time; but the exertion necessary in nursing nerves is everlasting and all the time, since it is often the work of years.—Harper's Bazar.

A RUSSIAN ROMANCE.

Particularly Recommended to Bashful Lovers With Heavy Tongues.

It was early morning in the pretty little village of Werchobistritzkiol; and Solovitch was but an hour high in the glowing heavens; the dew was still sparkling on the grass. Early as it was, the villagers were astir. Michaelvonovitch Pandalenrikio, the village baker, had taken down his wooden shutters, and had given morning greeting to Nicholiskkizovitch Disukskikiskoff, the grocer across the street, who was sweeping the pavement in front of his little shop.

Simeonskiovitch, the butcher, and Mandalzizziokoffski, the milkman, were merrily joking with old Dietwosmikiskafto Mediariovitch, the cobbler, before his little shop.

The door of a vine-clad little cottage opened suddenly, and a maiden clad in white appeared and walked toward the thick, dark, cool forest back of the village. She was Alexievonamagdra Lesschneiffovitch, daughter of the wealthiest man in the village. By her side gamboled her little white dog Fidovelovitch. He ran barking from her side in mad pursuit of a golden butterfly; returning, he jumped up before his mistress, soiling her pretty white gown with his wet and dirty paws.

"Down, Fidovelovitch!" she said chidingly: "down, sir, you—ah, is it thou, Dimitredistovelokoff Nicholasonovel Volenkiskiskiovonovitch?"

"It is I, Alexievonamagdra Lesschneiffovitch," said the young man; for it was a young man who had come suddenly from the forest.

"Why art thou sad, my Dimitredistovelokoff?" asked the maiden, noting his gloomy face.

"Ah, Alexievonamagdra, if I could only know that I was indeed thy Dimitredistovelokoff," he replied sadly.

"What meanest thou, Dimmy?" she said tenderly.

"Ha! dost thou not know? Thy father hast not told thee? Last night I spoke to him about our marriage. He spurned me, and said thou wert to wed old Simoenovkolokoffskivitch, the rich vineyard owner."

"Simoenovkolokoffskivitch!" gasped the maiden: "I marry him? Never! I would sooner wed with old Zokosokesokoff, the one-legged serf!"

"My darling!" cried Nicholasonoval Volenkitkiskiovonovitch, clasping her to his breast: "Come! Let us fly! My little yacht, the white-winged Delovonoskiffidiuk, lies there on the bosom of the Fritchedelogaffodasski Lake; let us fly to Szastoserskaiaotoff, or to beautiful Komorovogetzki, on the banks of the Dinovilvaddleskinkio—come, love; come!"

"My Dimitredistovelokoff Nicholasonoval Volenkiskiskiovonovitch!" she cried, sinking wearily into his arms, after speaking his full name twice: "I am thine!" THE END.—Zenas Dane, in Puck.

BATTLE WITH PIRATES.

How the British Ship Punjaub Captured the Crew of a Slaver.

As the vessels closed, broadside after broadside was exchanged, and Captain Dallas, seeing that her metal was heavy, determined on boarding. The Punjaub steered close alongside the bark, and, having grappled her, the first lieutenant, with two-thirds of the seamen and marines, boarded. On reaching her decks they met with determined opposition from about as fierce a set of desperadoes as ever were banded together for purposes of crime. Renegade Portugese, savage Malays, lithe, cruel-looking Manila men, and Chinese, all fought alike desperately, for they knew that they fought with halters round their necks. But they fought in vain. No men ever yet could stand against British sailors at sea. The Lascars emulated the valor of their shipmates, and as for the men of the Bombay Marine battalion, they were Sepoys—that is as much as to say they behaved as well as their European confreres could. Steady courage and perfect discipline prevailed over mere desperation, and in spite of the wolfish ferocity with which they struggled, the motley crew of the pirate began to give way before the cruiser's people. Their captain was cut down by Mr. Brownson, the first lieutenant, and his men dropped fast before the volleys of the marines, while the cutlasses and boarding pikes of the seamen and Lascars did deadly work. Part of the pirate crew ran below, where a couple of their own guns, loaded with grape and pointed down the hatchways, soon compelled them to surrender. The remainder barricaded themselves in the forecastle, but a few volleys reduced them also to submission. Mr. Brownson having overcome the resistance of the pirates, was about to haul down the black flag, when a signal from Captain Dallas warned him not to do so, but to get his prisoners into irons without delay.

One by one they were brought up, shackled and made to lie down. The reason of the Captain's order was soon obvious. The Arab dhows, though disabled for sailing, had got out long sweeps, and were coming to the assistance of the bark. As they did so the cruiser was cast loose from her opponent, and yawing, so as to get a chance with her long gun, raked the nearest from stern to stern with grape. Great was the slaughter, and greater still the consternation, especially, when the slavers saw the black flag fall to the deck of their ally and the British union jack hoisted in its place. They shouted "Amaum! Amaum!" and waved their turbans in token of submission. The steamer cruised alongside each in turn and allowed the slaver crews to come on board, having first dropped their arms. They were then ironed and placed in rows on the deck under a guard of marines. The bark was searched throughout and ample evidence of her character found. The fettered pirates were placed in safe confinement; a prize crew, under a lieutenant, was put on board, with orders for her to be got under way to accompany the Punjaub; the dead of both vessels were committed to the deep and the wounded to the care of the surgeon and his assistants. Then came the work of liberating the slaves and transferring them to the hold of the bark—a tedious and disgusting business, and dangerous withal, as many of the poor creatures were frantic from confinement and want of water, in a horrible state of filth, and so infuriated by their sufferings that they knew not friend from foe.—Chambers' Journal.

SANITARY PLUMBING.

Gross Ignorance Displayed by Designing Architects Everywhere.

Several prominent writers of the day call earnest and emphatic attention in the columns of popular magazines, scientific and trade papers, to the gross ignorance of the plainest principles of house drainage on the part of designing architects, in the construction of modern buildings. Whether the fault arises from ignorance or negligence, or whether the architect is hampered by instructions from the owner, he is equally to blame in accepting as a finished job a house into which sewer gas can find its way. St. Louis has such a favorable site for first-class public sewers, and such a superb system already built, that the cases are comparatively rare in which sewer gas can find its way into dwellings. But in a city built upon a level plain, where the danger is far greater, the precautions taken are far more ample and far more efficient. There are stone front residences in St. Louis to-day wherein the waste pipe leading from the sink to the sewer has not even an "S" trap between the two places, to say nothing of a proper system of ventilation, which is the only means outside of the use of chemicals for perfect protection.

Leading physicians say that their practice warrants the assertion, that the class of diseases known as malarial is on the increase, and that the type is rapidly becoming more pronounced. However this may be, the public have a right to demand from architects, builders and house owners the fullest protection the resources of modern knowledge and modern science can furnish. An incompetent architect or plumber is a deadly foe to the community.—Stoves and Hardware.

FACTS ABOUT PEARLS.

Where the Finest Are Found and How Their Growth May Be Stimulated.

"As far back as we have a history for any gems," said an old-time pearl fancier, "we have a record of pearls, and, not even excepting the diamond, is there a jewel so often spoken of in history, sacred and profane, as the pearl. There is scarcely a country on the face of the globe where pearls have not at some period been found, though at the present day the principal fisheries are confined to the coasts of Ceylon, Japan, Java, Sumatra, Bahrein, in the Persian Gulf, and the islands in the vicinity of Panama.

"The best pearls are obtained in the Persian Gulf. They excel in color, size, purity and that translucency which gives this gem its greatest value. The pearl fisheries in the Persian Gulf are said to yield upward of $1,500,000 annually. Those of Panama reach about the same figure. Pearls have also been found in the waters of the United States, and in 1858 considerable excitement was occasioned by the discovery of large pearls near Salem, in New Jersey. A New Jersey pearl, over an inch in diameter, found near Paterson, was sent to Paris, where it was purchased by the Empress Eugenie for $2,500, and when the crown jewels were sold last year by order of the Ferry Government it was resold for $3,700, and is now the property of a wealthy woman of New York.

"The pearl is simply carbonate of lime, with the addition of films of animal membrane between the many layers of mineral matter that, when dry, gives the pearl its hardness. Several species of bivalve mollusks secrete pearls, especially the true pearl oyster, and among fresh water species those sometimes found near Baltimore.

"Can pearls be produced at the will of man, or can they be multiplied by manipulation? It is asserted by oyster fishermen, and can be accepted as true, that the pearl oyster has the power of covering with additional layers such portions of its shell as need strengthening, as well as objects introduced by accident or design. The Chinese and Japanese, taking advantage of this, have long practiced the art of stimulating the secretion by introducing beads made of spar or powdered glass and varnish, or sometimes turned from mother-of-pearl, and thus do they actually succeed in forcing the animal to produce pearls at their will, though of an inferior quality.

"One of the curious circumstances connected with the New Jersey 'pearl fever' of 1858 was the discovery of a few shells showing that many years before some one had experimented upon the pearl-bearing oyster by dropping small mother-of-pearl buttons inside the shell, hoping that the animal would, in course of time, cover them with its secretion. The experiments proved a failure however, the result being that the buttons became fastened to the shells by the action of the secretion, but did not develop into pearls."

Some time ago a number of small pearls of the kind known in commerce as "seed pearls" were sent from Borneo, under the name of "breeding pearls." These pearls are enclosed in a glass tube along with some grains of rice "to feed upon." The sender gravely asserted that it had long been known in Borneo that pearls when put up for some time in a box along with rice would reproduce their kind. Three or four months afterward the grains of rice enclosed with the pearls had the appearance of being partially eaten. It is now several years since this shipment of pearls and their food was received, but the rice does not seem to have diminished to any greater extent than when they arrived, and the pearls themselves are no greater in circumference than when first seen.—N. Y. Letter.

How to Obtain Nice Lawns.

The lawn mower is a great institution in many ways. In one respect, like many other modern inventions, it is a valuable device when properly used. Unfortunately it is generally operated without any other idea or purpose than to keep the grass cut short. This it is expected, will make a soft, velvet sward; but it doesn't, unless the lawn can be deluged with water, which is not often the case. It should be borne in mind by all persons desiring to have a rich full, soft and thickly set sward, that if the roots are exposed to the sun they will be burned, and if not partially destroyed, produce a thin, straggling crop. In order to avoid this the roots should never be exposed, but sheltered by the young grass they produce. The lawn mower should not be used until the grass has attained a length of at least four inches, then it should not be cut more than two inches in well set grass, leaving at least two inches to protect the roots. This applies only to properly graded lawns and a luxuriant growth. If the soil is poor and the sward new, a longer growth should be kept cultivated. A beautiful, well-kept lawn requires intelligent treatment to become an ornamental adjunct to the family residence.—Harrisburg (Pa.) Call.

The Effect of Association.

No two individuals can come into contact with each other without each being affected by that contact. An inferior may help or harm a superior; but as a superior may the more easily help an inferior, so the superior is in the greater danger of harming the inferior. It is generally a matter of more importance, ultimately, to grown people how they act in the presence of children, than how children act in their presence. In view of this truth, it is the duty of every one to study how he should act in the presence of those with whom he may be thrown.—S. S. Times.

TEMPERANCE READING.

HARMFUL COOKERY.

How the Natural Taste May Be Vitiated in Childhood—A Few Thoughts for Conscientious Mothers.

That luxurious living, "faring sumptuously every day," will generally prove promotive of habits of intemperance, can not well be doubted. It is equally true that what we may call artificial cookery will produce the same effect. The spices, pungents, and irritants in general, not only tend to deprave the taste, preparing the way for intemperance by producing morbid appetites, but create an unnatural thirst, a thirst which is the most naturally gratified by the use of intoxicants. Hence, we shall find that boys fed in this way during the early part of life more generally become intemperate than those who have been accustomed to a more abstemious living. The most unfavorable consequences follow such artificial cookery, added to the excessive use of animal food, pork more especially. After the tastes have been vitiated in this way, after the irritants have so blunted the sensibilities, that water—the natural drink of man and beasts—is insipid, unsatisfying, it is perfectly natural that some drink of a more fiery nature should be demanded. These drinks more generally contain a certain per cent. of alcohol, the way being prepared by the use of ginger ale, porter and the whole range of beers. While it is true that those who really relish plain and simple food, with no great display of rich gravies and irritating sauces, are in but little danger of becoming drunkards, it is unwise in mothers to so feed their children with spices and irritants, radishes and the like, as to destroy the keen relish for water, plain food like bread and the fruits. It should be remembered that such articles as mustard, capable of blistering the surface of the arm, can not but prove harmful to the sensitive coats of the stomach, producing a vitiated state of the digestive organs, preparing the way, as has been stated, for degrading habits.

If we add to this harmful cookery the use of intoxicants, as brandy in mince pies, sauces, cake, puddings, the training in the direction of drunkenness is carried still further. It is difficult to conceive how an intelligent and thoughtful Christian mother, after having taken the Temperance pledge, can use any of these intoxicants in her cookery. It is difficult to conceive of any valid reason for their use, since it will not be claimed by the intelligent that they add any element of valuable nourishment. It is certain that the pure woman who has never been accustomed to the fumes of tobacco, or the taste of the milder drinks, will not particularly relish the flavor given by these, while none will presume that the young child will admire the brandy taste. It is certain, however, that just to the extent that the taste of these is recognized and relished—after the training of a few months—the food being all the more appetizing on account of their presence, habits of intemperance will be naturally formed. Alcohol is a poison, an element foreign to the human constitution, will produce the same vitiating effects, whether taken as a drink, or as a food, the uniform tendency being to produce abnormal appetites. Conscientious and Christian mothers will do well to give this subject their prayerful attention.—Dr. J. H. Hanaford, in Union Signal.

AN ARCH FIEND.

His Caldron of Temptations—What He Has Accomplished in the World.

An arch fiend arrived in our world, and he built an invisible caldron of temptation. He built that caldron strong and stout for all ages and all nations. First he squeezed into that caldron the forbidden fruit of paradise. Then he gathered for it distillation from the harvest fields and the orchards of the hemispheres. Then he poured into this caldron capsicum and copperas, and logwood and deadly nightshade, and assault and battery, and vitriol, and opium, and rum and murder, and sulphuric acid, and theft, and potash, and cochineal, and red carrots, and poverty and death and hops. But it was a dry compound, and it must be moistened and liquified, and so the arch fiend poured into that caldron the tears of centuries, of orphanage and widowhood, and he poured in the blood of 20,000 assassinations. And then the arch fiend took a shovel that he had brought up from the furnaces beneath, and he put that shovel into the great caldron and began to stir, and the caldron began to heave and rock, and boil and sputter, and hiss and smoke, and the nation gathered around it with cups and tankards and demijohns and kegs, and there was enough for all, and the arch fiend cried: "Aha! champion fiend am I. Who has done more for coffins and graveyards and prisons and insane asylums, and the populating of the lost world? And when this caldron is emptied I'll fill it again, and I'll stir it again, and it will smoke again, and that smoke will join another—the smoke of torment that ascendeth forever and ever.

THE TREATING HABIT.

Some Excellent Advice to Young Commercial Travelers.

We want to say a few words about the habit of treating customers to drinks, and to caution the younger members of the fraternity especially against this practice. It has been our experience, and no doubt is that of every old commercial traveler on the road, that it don't pay; view it from whatever standpoint you may. We are lowering our own manhood when we do it and are stooping to mean and unbusinesslike methods to secure a customer. Besides a customer that can be induced to buy from us by a few glasses of liquor or a couple of schooners of beer will not prove much of an acquisition to the house, and ninety-nine chances out of a hundred will prove a "black eye" to them financially. A leading commercial traveler in the city of Philadelphia, some years ago made this remark, after a long experience in mercantile life: "I have never known a single customer that was secured and held by the practice of treating that did not in the end become a scourge to the house obtaining him." So don't do it. Every man that is really worth securing for a customer, and a paying one, will be insulted by the proposition and the insinuation contained therein, be the invitation clothed in language however cordial. Of course offering a customer, already secured by honorable means, a friendly cigar in good-fellowship does not come under this head, and is all right. But when liquor, or beer, or cigars even, are held out as a bribe, to induce a man to buy, the act is an insult to manhood, and all of the trade that are really men will resent it. The day for that sort of thing is past. The commercial traveler who depends on the "bar" for his inspiration is fast disappearing into the great unknown. People are being rapidly educated up to a higher idea of life, in the commercial world as in the social. The time was when a young man about going on the road said: "Good-bye, honesty; good-bye, decency; good-bye, sobriety; I am going to be a commercial traveler." But the time is fast approaching when he will say: "Good-bye, dishonesty; good-bye, dissipation; good-bye, deception; I am going on the road." It may be some time, but it is bound to come. Let the "boys" begin right here by dropping the treating "act," and by so doing lift the profession at least one notch higher in the estimation of the public.—Merchant Traveler.

Insanity from Drink.

An English magistrate has been setting himself up as an authority on the question of the causation of insanity by the habitual or excessive use of alcoholic liquor. During a recent inquiry into the sanity of a person alleged to be of unsound mind and addicted to the use of ardent spirits, he demurred to the answer of the expert who, asked "whether drink would of itself cause lunacy," unhesitatingly affirmed that it would. To this Justice Dogberry retorted with the query whether the witness did not know that "a man in a state of intoxication would do stupid things and then completely recover himself after being locked up for forty-eight hours," and would he "call that insanity?"

The matter is of quite enough importance to merit attention on this side the Atlantic, where questions of unsound mind are adjudicated by men having fully as vague notions as this English judge on the subject of mental diseases. It should be understood, not only by such men but by the public generally, that alcohol is an entirely sufficient cause of insanity.

Delirium tremens is a common result of excessive indulgence; hardening of the brain tissues with impairment of mental function (cerebral sclerosis) is frequently caused by the long-continued use of spirituous liquors; while not seldom acute alcoholic delirium may pass directly into absolute and confirmed insanity—often with suicidal or homicidal tendency.

There is absolutely no safety for the man addicted to drinking who allows his reason ever to become clouded by an overindulgence. For him there is no middle way. He must either "touch not, taste not, handle not," or run the risk of the most deplorable termination of his habit.—Chicago News.

THE various computations of the amount spent yearly in this country on liquor are very curious. One speaker at a Temperance meeting the other night asserted that from the sums spent every year on liquor a thousand one-dollar gold pieces might be put on each word in the Bible, and that even then there would be $50,000 to spare.

DRUNKENNESS is a flattering devil, a sweet poison, a pleasant sin, which whosoever hath, hath not himself; which whosoever doth commit doth not commit sin, but he himself is wholly sin.—St. Augustine.

—Concerning lobsters, experts say that young crustaceans have to be put in the sea almost as soon as hatched, and they begin to feed voraciously. They are born with sense enough to know that lobsters make delicious food, and they attack one another savagely and hungrily. In a few days the lobster's walking or crawling members are developed, and he sinks to the bottom, where he makes his home.

Mr. Robin, however, kept the eggs warm by sitting on them for several days, but a lady who watched him says that he used to go away somewhere for long intervals, but not long enough to let the eggs get cold. At last he returned from one of his tours with another Mrs. Robin, who immediately took the place of the deceased wife and in time hatched the eggs, and behaved just as if they were her own.

ABOUT UMBRELLAS.

Semi-Civilized Countries Where They Are Considered Marks of Honor.

It certainly is strange that in almost all nations and in all ages there should have been this same singular jealous regal monopoly of so useful an object as a portable sunshade, which was also available as a protection against rain. But so it has ever been, even in the highest civilizations of early ages. We find it depicted on some of the most ancient sculptures of Persepolis, and also on those of Babylon and Nineveh, but always as a distinctive mark of honor for the great men and rulers. The Assyrian bas-reliefs show slaves holding a richly-ornamented umbrella above the head of the monarch, not only in scenes of peace, but even in time of war. It appears to be fringed with tassels, and is provided on one side with an embroidered curtain. In these sculptures this mark of distinction is reserved exclusively for the monarch, and it never overshadows any other person, however eminent. The same thing is observed in the sculptures of Babylon and Nineveh, in which the King alone is thus distinguished. Of the ancient Mexican Emperors it is likewise recorded that not only were they borne by relays of great nobles, but also that four more nobles of high estate were appointed to uphold the sacred umbrella which added dignity to the imperial procession. Even in the beginning of the present century the Mohammedan rulers of Hindostan claimed a monopoly of the use of the sunshade, and no one was permitted to carry an umbrella in the imperial presence. Thus it is recorded that certain English merchants having been admitted to an audience with the King of Delhi, the ladies who were of the company were ordered to dispense with their parasols, as being an infringement of the great Mogul's prerogative. So they had to protect their heads as best they might from the sun's burning rays by heaping on heavy folds of drapery. The magnificence of the Indian state umbrellas was amazing. Some were of crimson velvet, richly embroidered in gold, and the heavy golden handles, which were eight feet high, were incrusted with diamonds. That of the Queen of Lucknow, which is now treasured in the South Kensington Museum, is of blue satin, embroidered with gold and seed pearls. Some were of cloth of gold, others only of gilt paper. Some were even covered with gay feathers, but all had (or have) long handles, either of beautifully inlaid wood or precious metals, or even of carved ivory. The state umbrella of Indore is shaped like a mushroom.—English Illustrated Magazine.

WORTHLESS MANUSCRIPTS.

How Publishers Dispose of Most of the Works Submitted to Them.

Of the vast multitude of manuscripts offered to book publishers every year, probably seventy-five per cent. are worthless, or, at least, are not worthy of publication in book form. It is astonishing how many people there are in the world who imagine they are capable of writing a book. It is still more astonishing how few ever discover the truth of the matter, and acknowledge themselves mistaken. Even though their manuscripts may have been rejected by half a score of publishers, they go down to their graves believing themselves the victims of a base conspiracy to crush aspiring genius. Such loyal self-confidence were almost sublime were it not so ridiculous.

There seems to be a widespread belief among would-be authors that publishers are their natural enemies, and they take a peculiar, not to say fiendish, delight in rejecting manuscripts and crushing the hopes of those who aspire to the honors of authorship. This is an altogether mistaken idea. Publishers are human, like the rest of us. They follow the business for the money there is in it, and they are quick to take up a good thing when they have the opportunity. Nothing please a publisher more than to secure a really valuable book for publication, especially if he thinks it will sell well. He is glad to recognize the ability of the author, though the latter may be utterly unknown to fame, for henceforth their interests are mutual, so far as that book is concerned. Neither will the author have any difficulty in securing recognition from other literary men. There is no "charmed circle" in literature which an author of genuine merit may not enter.

Publishers are generally correct in their judgment of manuscripts. Long experience enables them to see their merit or demerits almost at a glance. A page here and there will give them a key to the general style and character of the work and will reveal to them faults the existence of which the writer has never even suspected. The manuscript is returned with a polite note "regretting that the present depressed state of the book trade compels us to decline its publication," etc. This, with a few words commending the good points of the book (if there are any) serves to sugar-coat the bitter pill of disappointment. Publishers are kind-hearted as a rule, though their kindness is not always appreciated. In rejecting an unworthy book the publisher does the author a real favor, though the latter seldom has the perception to see it or the manliness to acknowledge it. What greater favor can one man do another than to prevent his making a fool of himself before the public? Very often a man's best friends are those who save him from himself over his own protest.

There are two essential points in writing a successful book—the writer must have something to tell and he must know how to tell it. As to the first, of course every one who undertakes to write a book thinks he has something worth telling. Nine times in ten this is not true; and this mistake on the part of authors accounts in a large measure for the failure of so many books. When the book fails to command the attention and respect of the reading public, it is useless for the writer to rail at the public for the fault is pretty sure to lie at his own door. The man who has something worth telling and knows how to tell it is sure of an audience.

A great deal depends on this second point—knowing how to tell a thing. There is a certain tact in the use of language that is indespensable. Usually this tact is gained only by years of experience, and by many it is never gained at all. Very few people have it intuitively. This tact teaches what not to say as well as what to say. It is a valuable accomplishment to be able to express one's thoughts both briefly and clearly. The gods favor but few mortals thus.

There is no royal road to successful authorship, unless one is born a king—that is to say, a genius. Is it any wonder that so many aspirants fail to secure the coveted recognition from publishers?

Unless you are very confident that you have something of great importance to tell, and that you know how to tell it, don't tempt the fates by putting your ideas between the covers of a book.

"If a man could be sure
That his life would endure
At least for a thousand years," you might possibly live to get over the disappointment; otherwise, not.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

She Was Merely Joking.

They were on their bridal tour, and she said, gaily:

"Now, Fred, we don't want everybody in the car to know that we are newly married, and have them all staring at us. Let us act like real old married people. It'll be such jolly fun.

"All right," said Fred, calmly. "You just let me have that end of the seat; it's lots pleasanter than this. I'll take the pillow, too, and I guess I'll go to sleep for three or four hours. You wake me when we come to the dinner station. Spread that shawl over me, and——"

"O, I don't care who knows that we're just married," she said. Sit where you are, dear, and hold my hand."—Time.

PRANKS OF MONKEYS.

Comical Sights Observed by a Bicycle Traveler in India.

I wheeled some fourteen hundred miles along the monkey-infested highways and saw some very curious sights. Sometimes the monkeys would file in long strings across the road, close behind one another, each one looking anxiously behind, evidently very much disturbed at the strange appearance of the bicycle. Shinning up the tall toddy palms or cocoanut trees, one after another, they would hastily ensconce themselves among the thick foliage, and peer curiously down at me as I wheeled past, giving vent to their perturbation in excited cries. One day I remember whiling away an hour or so beneath a grove of sacred peepul trees, watching the amusing antics of a troop of monkeys in the branches overhead.

Their marvelous activity was here displayed to perfection, as they quarreled and chased one another from tree to tree. The old ones seemed passively irritable, and decidedly averse to being bothered by the antics and mischievous activity of the youngsters. Taking possession of some particular branch, they warned away all would-be intruders with threatening grimaces and feints. The youthful members of the party were full of pranks, carried on to the great annoyance of their more aged and sedate relatives. These, in revenge, put in no small portion of their time punishing or pursuing them with angry cries for their deeds of wanton annoyance.

One monkey, that had very evidently been there many and many a time before on the same thieving errand, with an amusing secresy and roguishness, slipped quickly along a horizontal bough, and thrust his arm into a hole. His eyes wandered guiltily around, as though expectant of detection and punishment. This apprehension quickly justified itself in the shape of a blue-plumaged bird that fluttered angrily about the robber's head and caused him to beat a hasty retreat. Birds' eggs were the booty he expected to find, and methought, as I noted the number, mischievousness and activity of the freebooters to whom birds' eggs would be most toothsome morsels, watchful indeed must be the parent bird whose maternal ambition bore its legitimate fruit in this monkey-infested grove. In me these monkeys seemed to recognize a possible dangerous enemy, and at my first appearance they hastened to hide among the thickest foliage. Peering cautiously down, they yielded themselves up to excited chattering and broad grimaces. After awhile they became somewhat reassured, and regarded me with less apprehension. The wild monkeys and the natives seem to get along famously together, one often seeing them occupying the shade of the same tree.

In the valley of the Hooghly, down toward Calcutta, my road sometimes partook almost of the character of a tunnel, burrowing through a mass of dense tropical vegetation. Cocoanut and toddy palms mingled their feathery foliage with the dark green of the mango, the wild pomoln, giant bamboo, and other indigenous vegetation characteristic of a hot and humid climate, and big creepers swung from tree to tree and wound the mass inextricable confusion.

In this magnificent conservatory of nature big, black-faced monkeys, with tails four feet long, romp and revel through the trees, nimbly climb the creepers, and thoroughly enjoy their life amid the sylvan scenes about them. It was a curious sight to see those big anthropoids, almost as large as human beings, swing themselves deftly up the festooned creepers at my approach—to see their queer, impish black faces peering cautiously out of their hiding place, and to hear their peculiar squeak of surprise and alarm as they noted the strange character of my conveyance, the bicycle. Sometimes a gang of them would lope awkwardly along ahead of the bicycle, looking every inch like veritable imps of darkness, pursuing their silent course through the chastened twilight of green-grown subterranean passage ways, their ridiculously long tails raised aloft, and their faces most of the time looking over their shoulder.—Nature.

TWO GOOD REMEDIES.

How to Cure Gapes in Chicks and Prevent Lice in Their Nests.

For gapes in chicks there are several good remedies. Fumigating with carbolic acid, and the lime remedy, are probably the surest. The lime remedy is the handiest and the safest, and its effect on the gape worms causes them to loosen their hold on the lining membrane of the windpipe, sets the chicks to coughing and sneezing, and the worms are thrown up. I have never heard of a case that this treatment did not cure, provided it was applied at any time before the chick was too far gone to cough. In addition to this treatment scatter a little air-slaked lime in the coop, and when you move a coop that has no floor, scatter the lime freely over the old spot.

Sulphur is useful to kill and prevent lice in the nests of setting and laying hens, but I have entirely discarded its use on chickens, or on hens that are running with chickens. Carbolic powder, or insect powder, is much better. To use the powder for lice on chickens that are running with a hen, take the hen after she has gathered her brood under her for the night, and dust the powder thoroughly into her feathers. The chickens will get enough of the powder as they nestle under the hen, and it will have all night in which to do its work on hen and chickens.—Fanny Field, in Ohio Journal.

—Pure iron can not be made permanently a magnet, but its magnetism only lasts while a current of electricity is circulating around it, and hence it is called an electro-magnet.

—Careful experiments have shown that waste silk is the most effective of all non-conducting coverings for steam pipes, and the demand for this purpose promises to be great, notwithstanding the high price.

—Dr. C. Keller, of Zurich, claims from careful observation of their habits, that spiders by destroying aphides and insects perform a very important part in the preservation of forests.

—A London company is reported to have secured patents for the chemical production of aluminum, sodium and potassium; and to be able to manufacture aluminum at considerably less than one shilling per pound.

—It has been found in California that a cold-air blast dries fruit in the most satisfactory manner. Samples of fruit dried in this way—prunes, apricots and apples—two years ago, are still in a perfect state of preservation.

—In preparing chocolate, the powder is made into a paste by grinding between hot stones. Vanilla, cinnamon and other spices, with a certain amount of sugar, are added, and well mixed with paste. While still hot, this paste is put into molds to harden.

—The new gas engine, known as the silent engine, invented recently in England, is coming into use on account of its simplicity of construction and excellent results. It has an ignition at every revolution, instead of at every two or three revolutions, as in the Otto and other gas engines.

—The deleterious effect of arsenic on the skin was recently discussed in the Pathological Society of London. It seems that the skin is the tissue on which arsenic has the most marked influence, and the poison may spoil the complexion instead of improving it, by making it muddy and unsightly.

—Tea drinkers will welcome a new competitor in the tea-markets of the world. A few years ago an English settler in Natal planted a few acres there with tea. His first crop, produced in 1881, amounted to no more than 500 pounds, but the production has so increased since then that last year Natal put upon the market about 100,000 pounds of tea. The industry is spreading rapidly, and it seems likely that before long South Africa will become a serious rival to China and India in this trade.

—It has been proposed to do away with the use of explosives in mines where their use is attended with danger, and substitute the lately invented cartridge—one portion of which is filled with a mixture of finely divided zinc and zinc oxide, which collects in the condensers of the zinc retort, while the other part is filled with dilute sulphuric acid. According to the requirements in this case, the cartridge is put in its intended place, and then, by suitable mechanism, the acid is allowed to flow into the zinc. Hydrogen is then evolved, and, by its expansive force, the rock is broken down, without combustion or violent explosion.

THE MASCULINE HEAD.

A Hat Dealer Asserts That It Is Growing Larger in This Country.

"It is interesting," said a hat salesman yesterday, "to notice how the shape of a man's head gives away his nationality."

"Can you tell where a man was born by sizing up his head?"

"Certainly, but not before he tries a hat. Americans have long, narrow heads, and when an average American comes in for a hat the chances are that if it is long enough fore and aft it is too wide at the sides. If it fits exactly at the sides it has to be pulled out in front. Now, with Germans it is the reverse. The heads of Germans are wide at the temples, and if the hat is the exact length, in nine cases out of ten it has to be stretched sideways to fit."

"How about Englishmen's heads?"

"Englishmen's heads are not so pronounced in width. There is more of a sliding scale with them as to relative length and breadth. Irishmmen have oval heads and they are generally easily fitted.

"Some people with apparently small heads require large hats, and others who seem to have large heads wear a small hat. A man may have a large face, and yet the part which the hat covers may be comparatively small. Taken altogether, heads seem to be growing larger. I have been thirty years in business, and when I began to sell hats the average size ranged from 6¾ to 7. Now the average is from 7 to 7⅛."—N. Y. Telegram.

Thousands of Years Saved.

One may get some idea of what railways mean in the saving of time and money to passengers, by taking the case of London. It is estimated that about 500,000 persons, or about one-tenth of the population of the entire area of the metropolis, require to travel to and from their business every day all the year round. If we remember the distances, it is not too much to assume that the railway will economize for each at least two hours in the week, or, say five days per annum each. This over 500,000 of people means 2,500,000 days, or an economy of 8,300 years of 300 working days each. Suppose the average earnings of these 500,000 people to be £100 per annum each, not too high an average when we remember the number of millionaires included in the total, we shall see a total money saving, in the sense of time being money, of equal to £830,000 per annum. And this in London alone.—Chambers' Journal.

They receive sixty cents per day, while our blacksmiths receive $2 for the same work. I asked the Belgian proprietor why he didn't pay more. He said: "I am handicapped. When I get $100 worth of car springs into the New York harbor (for I sell my car springs in America) I have to salute your Yankee flag and give up $50.'"

"Where does that come from?" I asked.

"It comes off of my men's wages," he said.

"But suppose America had free trade?"

"Free trade!" he exclaimed, "Why, I would flood the Yankees with car springs. I would treble my works to-morrow."

"But wouldn't that break our steel car-spring makers up?" I asked.

"Yes, for a while."

"How long?"

"Why, till your men worked for sixty cents per day, as our men do."

"But there are politicians in America," I said, "who advise the laboring men to vote for this same free trade."

"And the men listen?"

HER UNCLE'S PET.

Old Mr. Brown stood in his private office, with his back to the fire and his coat-tails balanced in either hand. He was a baldheaded old gentleman with a ruddy complexion, keen black eyes, and leg-of-mutton whiskers which were white as snow. And Miss Nelly Torrance sat looking at him timidly from the depths of the big armchair in which he had beckoned her to seat herself.

"So you are my cousin Adrian's daughter?" said he, after a long pause.

"Yes," said Nelly, wondering what was in all those mysterious tin boxes, and whether the monster iron safe was full of gold and silver safes.

"And you want something to do?"

"Yes, please?"

"Humph!" said Mr. Brown.

Nelly glanced shyly up into his face, but she added with some spirit, "I am not asking for charity. I am willing to work for my bread!"

"You mean that you would like to daub canvass, or sew impossible yellow sunflowers on green plush screens," atirically observed the old gentlemat "I don't call that work!"

"Nor I, ither," retorted Nelly.

"Then, what do you mean?" said Mr. Brown

"I mean hat I shall be glad to undertake anysort of honest work by means of which I can earn my own living."

"Humph!" again interjected Mr. Brown. "Can you cook?"

"Yes," Nell answered.

"I don't believe it!"

"But I can."

"Very well," said Mr. Brown, releasing his coat-tails and sitting down at his desk as if the question were definitely disposed of. "My cook went away this morning. I haven't engaged any one in her place. You may come this afternoon and see what you can do for me."

Mr. Brown fully expected that this young cousin would recoil indignantly from this proposal, but she did nothing of the sort. She simply said, "Yes, Cousin John," and asked him for his private address.

"Mind you're punctual—for I am punctual," he handed her the pencilled card.

"I am always punctual," calmly responded Nelly.

Mr. Brown watched her out of the office with a quizzical twinkle in the corner of his eyes.

"She won't come," he said to himself. "I've seen the last of my fine relation.

And Nelly Torrance went home to a little second-floor room, the cheapest which the widow and her daughters could possibly find.

Mrs. Adrian Torrance was dressed in black, a fair delicate piece of human china, who had been like the lilies of the field, in that she toiled not, neither did she spin, and Lucetta, the elder daughter, was trying, unsuccessfully enough, to trim a black crape bonnet by the window.

They had come up from the country at Lucetta's suggestion to appeal, in their poverty, to this rich cousin of the dead father and husband, but none of them anticipated any very satisfactory results from the experiment.

"These rich people are always miserly," said Miss Lucetta.

"And I've understood," sighed the gentle little widow, "that he was not pleased when poor dear Adrian married me instead of Miss Goldbags, the rich pawnbroker's daughter."

"Well?" cried Mrs. Torrance eagerly, as Nelly entered.

"What does he say?" questioned Lucetta, dropping the crape which she was vainly endeavoring to fashion into what the fashion plate called "an oblong bow."

"I have seen him," said Nelly, untying her bonnet-strings. "And I'm going to his house in Grandover Park this afternoon."

"You don't mean," cried Mrs. Torrance, with a spasmodic catching of her breath, "that he is going to—adopt you?"

"Not in the least," said Nelly. "Now, mamma darling, don't jump at conclusions. Just hear my plain, unvarnished tale. I went to Cousin John, I told him I wanted something to do. He asked me if I could cook. Thanks to that course of lessons I once took of Signor Silverspoon, I was able to answer yes. Then he told me that his cook was gone, and asked me if I would come to his house this afternoon and take her place."

"And you?" gasped Mrs. Torrance.

"I said yes—of course."

"Eleanor!" cried Lucetta, "I am scandalized by your conduct! Yes, perfectly scandalised! You will do nothing of the sort!"

"Certainly not," said Mrs. Torrance, developing strong hysterical symptons. "If your cousin Brown intends to insult us——"

"But he dosen't mean to insult us," pleaded Nelly. "He intended the offer in all good faith, and I accepted it in the same spirit."

"You surely do not mean to degrad yourself," cried Lucetta, "by turning cook—for any man living!"

"I don't see," argued Nelly, "that it is any more degrading to cook for Cousin John than it would be to embroider slippers for him, or read the newspaper aloud to him of an evening."

"Eleanor never had any proper pride," said Mrs. Torrance, wringing her hands.

"Never!" echoed Lucetta.

"And," added Nelly, "my cousin would have every right to believe me an impostor if I had told him I wanted work, and had then refused the first offer he made. It will be useless for you to remonstrate, Lucetta, and I hope mamma will not place any obstacles in my way. For I am quite determined to go to Grandover Park this afternoon."

And she adhered firmly to her resolution.

It was six exactly when Mr. Brown let himself into his house with the latch-key, which always depended from his watch chain. The gas jet burned softly behind the rose-colored shade in the hall, the fire clicked cheerfully in the grate of the parlor beyond a most inviting apartment.

"Humph!" he muttered, "She hasn't come. Thought so! There's no such thing as a practical woman now-a-day."

At the same moment a light, white-aproned little figure came out of the dining-room beyond, and Nelly Torrance's voice uttered these words:

"Dinner is ready, Cousin John."

The old man smiled. He had a pleasant expression of the face when he smiled, and Nelly wondered that [illegible] handsome man he was.

"Oh," said he you did come, then.

"Oh I always keep my engagements," said Nelly. "Punctuality is the soul of business, isn't it, Cousin John? At least that's what I used to write in my copy books at school."

Mr. Brown patted her hand as she helped him off with his overcoat.

"You are a good girl," said he.

And in his secret mind he decided to put up with any deficiencies in the cooking of a girl who had such excellent business principles.

But, to his infinite amazement, there were no deficiencies to overlook. The soup was on the table as clear as water, flavored like a dream of Soyer's own.

The first course was baked trout, swimming in wine sauce, the second a pigeon on toast. A small and compact roast of beef ribs was flanked by a dainty giblet-pie, and the dessert was fruit, peach tarts, and Bavarian cream.

Mr. Brown ate, relished and wondered, by turns.

"My dear," said he at last, when the cloth was removed and the wine and walnuts brought on, "all is very nice. I'll concede that you are a tip-top housekeeper. But of course, you ordered all this from Moverato's restaurant?"

But of course I didn't, Cousin Brown," said Nelly decidedly. "I cooked it all myself."

"What, that soup?"

"Yes, that soup."

"Did you prepare that trout sauce and broil that pigeon?"

"Yes, Cousin Brown."

"And the giblet-pie? Was that yours?"

"Yes, and the giblet-pie! Don't look so astonished, Cousin Brown," she added, laughing. "I may as well confess that I took a course of cooking lessons last summer. And I like it of all things, especially in a household like this, where one can command the very best material.

Mr. Brown closed his eyes and made a mental calculation. His life had been "worried out of him," to use a mediocre expression, by capricious housekeepers, inefficient cooks, and untrained servants. At last, was a gate-way out of all his tribulations?

"My dear," he said, "I should like to have you come here and live."

"As cook, Cousin Brown?"

"No—as my adopted daughter and housekeeper. I need some one to take the helm of affairs. By Jupiter! he added as he recollected the flavor of the giblet-pie. "I haven't eaten such a dinner in ten years,"

"But my mother," hesitated Eleanor, "and my sister Lucetta?"

"Let them come, too," said Mr. Brown. "Bless your heart, my dear, there's plenty of room in the house. can they cook, too?"

"No, Cousin Brown," confessed Nelly.

"Well, perhaps it's just as well," said Mr. Brown. "There can't be more than one head to a household. I hope you have preserved the recipe of that giblet-pie. It certainly was something extraordinary."

So the Torrance family found a comfortable refuge for the soles of their feet, and Nelly's despised accomplishment proved the sword wherewith she opened the world's oyster.

And Lucetta sighed and wondered why she, too, had not taken cooking lessons.

"Nelly is the old man's first favorite," said she, "He'll leave her all his money when he dies. And all because she accepted his ridiculous offer of turning cook for a living."

Mr. Brown, however, looked at this matter in a different light.

"Nelly is a trump," he said "She is not like the typical young lady, who is too lazy to work, and too proud to beg. She is one who ennobles the humblest task, and does, with all her might, whatever her hands finds to do.

So the old proverb came true: "Heaven helps those who help themselves."

Further than this our little story cannot go at present, but good-natured gossip does say that ere long Nelly will be more than Housekeeper to Mr. Brown.

The Democratic party makes strenuous claims of being an anti-monopoly party. Its organs howled at Chauncy M. Depew when he was talked of at Chicago as a candidate because he is a railway president. It seems, however, that the Democratic party is opposed to such men only when they are Republicans. When [illegible] they have not a word to say. Just look, for instance, at the make-up of the new Democratic campaign committee. It is composed of:

Wm. H. Barnum, iron master and railroad man,

Senator Gorman, of the Baltimore & Ohio railroad.

Senator Barbour, late of the Virginia Midland.

Mr. Calvin S. Brice, a railroad magnate of Tennessee, and builder of the Nickel plate in Ohio.

Mr. W. L. Scott, coal operator and railroad manager.

Mr. Arthur Sewell, of Maine, late president of the Eastern railroad of New England and the Mexican Central.

Mr. Niles Ross, one of New Jersey's coal barons.

Mr. Phelps, a rich merchant.

Senator Ransom, of North Carolina, a planter and lawyer, once a major-general in the Confederate army, who surendered at Appomattox.

Having carefully read the columns of several of our esteemed free trade contempararies, we admit that they prove satisfactorily (to themselves) that—

1.—Free trade would benefit the workingman by making food cheaper

2.—It would benefit the farmer by making food dearer and manufactured goods cheaper.

3.—It would benefit the manufacturer by making goods dearer.

This is equal, we submit to the borrower who declared to the lender that "the pot was cracked when I borrowed it; it was whole when I returned it; and I never had your confounded old pot anyway!"

There is nothing like candor; and the Democratic majority of the House committee on Invalid Pensions is quite candid when it recommends that if any soldier's pension is not sufficient for his support he shall "accept the charity of the local authorities," That is, rather than give him a sufficient pension to support him frugally, let him go to the poor house.

"Are we going to have a pic-nic this year?" inquired a youngster of a Sunday School teacher,

"Why, what do you want of a pic-nic?"

"Nothing much, but I can get six new scholars in a hurry if you are going to have one."

OVER AND OVER AGAIN.

'Tis a saying trite, repeated ofttimes,
"A housekeeper's work is never done;"
The household wheels must be oiled each day
And the work go on from sun to sun.

There is washing, and ironing, and baking to do
While swift as a weaver's shuttle time goes,
And the small jobs sandwiched between these tasks
No one but a housekeeper guesses or knows.

The Johns of the household have their weak points,
Although for the most part good men and true;
Not faults that are glaring; oh, no; no, no!
But follies and foibles like me and like you.

Some Johns have a penchant for delicate bread,
And some for a mealy potato,
And some we have known covet polished shirt fronts,
And this, we must own, is but nature.

The children, too, must be coddled and fed,
Their bruises court-plastered, and each little sprite
Schooled, scolded, and guarded from perils by day,
And lovingly, tenderly cared for at night.

Wearisome, isn't it, sisters all?
Wearing alike to heart and brain.
No way to avoid it, no way to shirk
Doing the same things over again.

But would we exchange, for store, or shop,
Or the factory's busy, unceasing whirl,
The quiet home where we reign a queen,
And go back again and again be a girl?

No; we'll cherish our homes, and each pet her John,
And nurture with care the children dear,
Patiently, cheerfully filling our lives,
Doing the same things year after year.

ALL A MISTAKE.

But It Nearly Wrecked the Happiness of Two Lives.

There probably was not a brighter or a cozier room in any house in New York than the breakfast room in John Wheatleigh's house. It was somewhere in the 30's, just off of Fifth avenue, of which a glimpse could be caught through the east windows, which admitted a flood of sunlight on the glass and fine damask of the table, and brought out the golden lights in Mrs. Wheatleigh's brown hair.

There could not have been a more agreeable couple to look upon, either—he, tall, athletic, with an open, manly countenance—she, pretty, elegant and womanly. They were a happy pair, too, as happiness goes, and no heavier cloud darkened their matrimonial sky than the one which was now hovering over the breakfast table. For that there was a cloud this morning there could be no possible doubt. The fullness about Mrs. Wheatleigh's lips, the droop of her lids, and the elevation of her eyebrows formed an undeniable pout, while her husband's face expressed doubt, anxiety and annoyance in turn. Though the atmosphere was clear when the meal began, the doubt had been lurking in John Wheatleigh's eyes ever since he took his seat at the table. In his heart it expressed itself in the hesitation between "I will tell her" and "I won't tell it seemed unnecessary; there was no reason why he should, and perhaps Nettie would not understand it, which would be very awkward. Then he considered the affirmative side of the question; Nettie was a thoroughly sensible woman, she had never shown the least trace of jealousy; any thing that he would tell her about, honestly and openly, she would consider right, or if she did not she would tell him so gently and without any fuss.

He looked at her as she bent her pretty head over the morning paper, humming a little tune meanwhile. She seemed to feel his gaze, and glancing up at him, smiled. John's heart smote him. How could he think of keeping any thing from his sweet little wife! Of course he would tell her—he was half sorry he had promised to go; if she objected he wouldn't. "Just as soon as I finish this egg," thought he; "in the meantime I'll think of the best way to tell her."

That was a fatal egg for John. He was some time in disposing of it. When he had finished he cleared his throat, and had actually uttered the initial N of his wife's name when Mrs Wheatleigh cried: "O, John, they are going to play 'Cymbeline' to-night; won't you take me?"

That question was the death knell of John Wheatleigh's confession. He could never tell his wife, in excuse for not taking her to the theater, that he was going himself with another lady, or at least a party in which there were other ladies.

"To-night did you say, Nettie? I don't believe that I can go to-night."

"O, John, why not?"

"Won't to-morrow night do?"

"No," said Mrs. Wheatleigh, looking at the paper, "this is the only performance of 'Cymbeline.'"

"I am going to be out to-night, Nettie; I don't think I can take you very well; but any other night I will be glad to."

"You are going to the club, I suppose. I wish you did not spend so much time there. Is this something so important that it can't be put off? I do want to see 'Cymbeline' so much."

"See here, Nettie, it's like this," said John; Ed Wilson, a friend of mine from out of town, is going to be here to-night, and I want to show him around a little and—and take him to the club, perhaps; in fact, I've written to him promising to meet him. Now do be reasonable, Nettie."

The cloud lifted from Mrs. Wheatleigh's brow entirely. "I will be reasonable, John; of course if you are engaged with your friend, I shan't interfere. I'll tell you what I might do. If you will get the tickets, I'll send over to Cynthia Olds to go with me; she will be glad of the chance. We'll take a cab and drive to the theater, and it will be perfectly safe."

John was glad to have the matter settled so easily, but his wife's sharp speech still rankled a little, and he felt that he ought not to give in all at once.

"I don't like your going out at night without an escort, and I don't like your going with Cynthia Olds, anyhow. What you see in her to make you want to continue the intimacy, I can't imagine. She is a silly, simpering old girl, without an idea that she hasn't got from some yellow-backed novel, and a woman whose tongue runs as hers does is sure to be a dangerous companion."

"Cynthia is not so bad as you make her out, John; she is foolish about some things, I know, and exaggerates a good deal, but I never heard her say any thing ill-natured about anybody. It is a pleasure to take her out, she enjoys every thing so much. But as you evidently do not wish me to go to the theater, I shall say no more about it."

"There, my dear, you may do as you like," said John. "Ask Cynthia to go with you and I will bring the tickets to-night." And so all was serene.

When John Wheatleigh took his seat in the elevated train he drew a letter from his pocket—the letter which caused the little jar in his home that had so quickly subsided. He read it hastily:

"NEWARK, N. J., April 10.—Dear Wheatleigh: I am coming over to New York on Thursday with my wife and her sister—you remember Ethel, of course. We want to go somewhere in the evening, and would be delighted to have you join us at the Hoffman House at six for dinner, and make a partie carree. I hear the operetta of 'Madame Roquette' is very good; may I commission you to secure four places for our party and don't fail to meet us? My wife wishes to be remembered. Yours truly, E. H. WILSON."

"Confound it," he muttered, "I don't like it; I wish I hadn't been in such a hurry to accept his invitation."

He remembered Miss Ethel very well; a handsome girl she was, too, but not handsomer than her sister, Mrs. Wilson. "Of course they couldn't have asked Nettie; they don't know her. I'm hanged, though, if I think it's the thing to invite a married man without his wife. I wish I'd told her! However, I am in for it now, I suppose."

He left the train and went to a theatre where a great artist was playing Shakesperean dramas, and bought two places for "Cymbeline." Then he went on to his office. All morning, however, he was absent-minded and low-spirited; he let several good opportunities on the exchange pass unnoticed. About noon he made a sudden resolution. "I shan't dine with them at any rate; I'll go home and take dinner with Nettie; I'll compromise on that." He sat down and wrote:

"DEAR WILSON: I am very sorry, but I find it impossible to get away in time to take dinner with you this evening. I shall join you at the theater, though, and therefore enclose the three tickets for yourself and ladies, to whom please make my compliments and regrets at being obliged to forgo a part of the pleasure of the evening. Faithfully, WHEATLEIGH."

Comic opera was a form of entertainment which John Wheatland loathed, yet here he had consigned himself to enduring three hours of jingling music and prancing women, while refusing to go with his wife to witness a noble play.

He put the three tickets into the envelope with his note and sealed it, thinking to himself meanwhile: "I wish there was some way out of the whole business—I might say I was ill—poor little Nettie! 'Madame Rouquette,' indeed! Pshaw!"

Then he called a messenger, dispatched his letter, and in so doing laid the train to a pretty mine, which by evening might explode with a formidable result.

You will probably guess what John Wheatleigh did in his absent-minded, self-reproachful state of mind, so there need be no secret about it. He was reckoned one of the shrewdest and keenest-witted men on the cotton exchange, yet he did now what shrewd and keen-witted men sometimes do—committed an egregious blunder.

He had in his pocket six theater tickets. All were red, and of the same general appearance. He inclosed the two tickets he had bought for his wife, and one operetta ticket in the note to his friend Wilson, and thus the three tickets he retained, one for himself and two for Nettie, were all for "Madame Rouquette."

When he came home to dinner Nettie met him with a smile. "Could you get the tickets, John, dear? O, I'm so glad! Cynthia will go. How I wish, though, it was you!"

"Indeed, I wish it was, Nettie. I would break this engagement to-night if I could, but Wilson is an old friend and I would not like to offend him."

"And I wouldn't like to have you either, dear. I was cross this morning, wasn't I? I was sorry for it though, afterward. Please forgive me, John, dear—you are always good to me," and she put her arms around his neck and kissed him. "Aren't you well, John, quite well, Nettie; a little headache, that is all."

Mrs. Wheatleigh was not quite dressed when her husband came to bid her good-bye. "I'll try to be back as soon as you are, Nettie," he said, as he kissed her. He was on the stair when his wife called to him: "John, you haven't given me the tickets!—don't come back; I'll run down to you."

He fumbled hastily in his pocket and drew out the three tickets. "Madame Roquette—that's mine"—he heard Nettie on the stairs—these other two are hers—don't come down, dear; there they are."

"You foolish boy," said Nettie, "you are sure you are quite well, John? There—good night."

Cynthia was not quite ready when the cab stopped at her door. Her toilet was a matter requiring great preparation; presently, though, she came running out.

"How are you, dear Nettie?—so good of you to think of me so often! Isn't Mr. Wheatleigh going? Just we two? How nice! What is 'Cymbeline,' Nettie? Shakespeare, isn't it? I don't think I ever read it—is it a tragedy? How nice!"

"No, Mr. Wheatleigh couldn't go to-night," explained Nettie, "he had an important engagement with a business friend at the club."

Cynthia rattled on telling Nettie of all her comings, and goings since their last meeting until they reached the theater. They entered the house and Nettie handed her tickets to the man at the gate.

"You're in the wrong place, ladies," said he; "these tickets don't belong here."

"Dear me," said Nettie, "where are we? Did the cabman make a mistake? Aren't you playing 'Cymbeline'?"

"Yes ma'am, but these tickets are for 'Madame Roquette,' at an up-town house. The address is on your tickets—please step aside a moment, ladies."

"O, how provoking," said Nettie. "How could John have made a mistake! He knew it was 'Cymbeline' I wanted to see—we talked of it quite awhile."

"Perhaps they will exchange them at the box-office" suggested Cynthia.

"O, no, they won't do that," replied Nettie, taking out her purse: "we must buy new tickets. Dear me, I have only enough here to pay the cabman! Have you any money, Cynthia?"

Cynthia humbly acknowledged to not having a penny.

"Well, there is nothing to do, then, but to drive home," said Nettie. "O, I am so disappointed!" They found a cab and were rolling up-tawn when Cynthia said: "Nettie, so long as we have the tickets, why shouldn't we go to see 'Madame Roquette?' I hear it is splendid. Floria de Brassi sings in it, you know. If we don't like it we can come away in a little while."

"Very well, Cynthia," replied Nettie, apathetically. She was thinking how could he have been so careless, when he knew she wanted so much to see this play! But she had invited Cynthia to go with her and felt bound to make the best of the matter.

Cynthia hastily put her head out of the window and told the man where to drive, Secretly she was delighted at the change in the programme. Shakespeare was very nice, of course, but such a thing as "Madame Roquette" was not to be seen every day. "Bennie de Forrest was telling me all about it last night, Nettie," she said, "he says it is simply grand, and that Floria de Brassi is the loveliest, most bewitching thing! The men are all wild about her. She sings a 'topical song' or something, called 'Now He's a Married Man,' that brings down the house, Bennie says. I don't know that I approve of such things," she added, deprecatingly, "but it's well enough to go once in awhile, especially when everybody is talking about a thing; it makes one feel like going to see it in spite of one's self; don't you think so?"

"I suppose it does, Cynthia; I never heard any thing about it."

The operetta had begun when they entered the theater. A little man accompanied by two handsome ladies was raising a great commotion about something with an usher. Nettie just glanced at them as she passed. Their seats were in the orchestra, and the house seemed quite full, with the exception of one chair adjoining their own. Cynthia divested herself of her jacket at once and prepared to enjoy herself.

"We can put our things on that seat next to you, Nettie; if anybody comes we'll take them away again," she said.

Nettie placed Cynthia's coat in the vacant seat, and as she did so her eyes fell on the man beyond it; he was staring at her with wide open eyes and hanging jaw; he looked quite stupefied. The man was her husband.

"Why, John! how came you here? I thought—is this a surprise, or a joke—what does it mean, John?"

"Nettie," he said, hastily, "there has been a mistake; I found it out and came—I mean let us go quickly—quickly, Nettie!" He rose to his feet; Nettie was quite bewildered, while Cynthia stared—"Quick, Nettie—"

"Ah, Wheatleigh, I've found you, have I?" cried a little man bustling up; "such a deuce of a time I've had. What on earth did you mean by sending me one ticket for this place and two for somewhere else, Lord knows where! I've been having a fine row back there, and the girls are as mad as hornets. Maud didn't like it when you didn't come to dinner, anyhow. O, I could give you a jolly scolding. How did you get such a bull? Are these the seats here? The usher will try to straighten the thing out if these ladies will kindly let him see their coupons. May be——" His words were drowned in a burst of applause. Floria de Brassi, as the young Prince Faillard, had bounded on the stage—a glory of blonde hair and silk fleshings. Nettie had not an idea of what the trouble was about she looked at her husband, who was still standing. His face was white, his lips moved, but she could not hear the words The usher was saying something to Cynthia, who was helplessly fumbling at her box for the coupons Nettie had handed her when they came in; but what was this the woman on the stage was singing, her hands passed to her heart, and her eyes rolled up in mock agony!

"Ah sweet sequled one!
Ah, poor deluded one!
He'll fool yo if he can.
Now he's a married man,
Ha—ha!
Now he's a married man."

Nettie comprehend every thing in a flash. The little ma and the two handsome women standing back there belonged to her husband's party—through some mistake she and Cynthia were in their places, and they were trying to get them out. She rose to her feet and turned to her husband with indignant eyes. "Nettie, come with me," he said, in a lov voice. "I will explain every thing." Nettie felt a strong revulsion; she grasped Cynthia by the wrist and hurried her away. "One moment, ladies—I mean no offense," said the little man—"by Jove, Wheatleigh, they've gone!"

In the aisle they almost ran into a man staggering under a great basket of flowers; the odor made Nettie faint.

As for Cynthia she only knew that something dreadful had happened. Nettie was deathly pale and looked straight before her, not having uttered a word since they left the theater. Cynthia took her two hands and held them tight, not knowing what else to do. How terrible it all was, yet how wildly exciting! She recalled John Wheatleigh's haggard face, the excitable voice of the little man, the well-bred amusement with which the two women had regarded the [illegible] she had seen those women before, and [illegible] such an adventure that poor Cynthia found herself taking a kind of guilty joy in the situation. And Nettie—how stonily she stared before her; she didn't look like Nettie Wheatleigh at all. Would it be in the papers in the morning? Would Nettie get a divorce? Every body would know that she had been there and had seen it all, and would come to her for the particulars. Cynthia fairly grew giddy at the prospect of her coming importance. Now they were at Nettie's house, she must go in; she could not leave the poor girl while she looked like that. Then Nettie spoke for the first time.

"Come in the house," she said, hoarsely; "tell the man to wait."

She ran up-stairs and flung herself upon the bed, face downward. Cynthia gently took off her bonnet and would have bathed her face, but Nettie motioned her away. She did not cry or make a sound, but only buried her face in the pillows as though she felt a thousand eyes upon her and was ashamed.

There was a violent ring at the bell, and John Wheatleigh came rushing up the stairs. She sprang to her feet.

"Nettie, darling, where are you? O, Nettie, don't look at me like that—let me tell you! Miss Olds please go into the next room for a few moments; I must speak to my wife alone."

"Stop; remain where you are, Cynthia. Do you not see that whatever you have to say to me must be said before her—now?"

"Nettie, dearest, it was all a mistake. That was Ned Wilson, his wife and her sister. I was going with them, you see—to meet them, that is, and I mixed the tickets up—I gave you—I ought to have told you."

"It was shameful," she said, in a low, hard voice, "to humiliate me before all those people, before Cynthia, before"—she shuddered—"those two women."

"Nettie, I swear I meant to tell you at the table this morning, the words were on my very lips to tell you. I had written to Ned Wilson then, but I had made up my mind not to go if you didn't want me to, and just as I was going to speak you asked me to take you—then we had that silly little quarrel, and I foolishly went away without telling you. If you knew how miserable I had felt all day—it was that that made me send—O God! she doesn't believe me!" and the poor boy covered his face with his hands and gave a great sob. Then it was that the true and beautiful womanly instinct arose and showed itself in the despised Cynthia.

"Nettie," she said, firmly, you are making too much of this; your husband has done no wrong—look at him, Nettie. He concealed something from you because he was piqued—it was foolish, but not wicked, and he was sorry for it before it was made known to you in the way it was to-night. I know who Mrs. Wilson is, and who her sister is—he loves you and nobody else. You can trust me, can't you, when I promise never to speak of this to any one, and—and Nettie, I shall try to forget it myself."

"O, I did not deserve it, John; I did not, indeed!" and Nettie flung herself sobbing on her husband's neck, as Cynthia silently withdrew.

All his life John Wheatleigh loved Cynthia Olds for those words. The simper on her kindly face was as a beautiful smile to him ever after—her harmless twaddle as pleasant music.

The operetta of 'Madame Roquette' had a long run in the metropolis. The airs were played on hand organs, by street bands, and by energetic young ladies on the piano, but although Nettie forgave her husband freely, and restored him to her perfect confidence, she could never hear "Now He's a Married Man," without a spasm of the heart.—The Epoch.

—A new method of preserving the colors of pressed flowers comes from Germany. It consists in dusting salicylic acid upon the fresh petals, or pressing the flowers between sheets of blotting paper impregnated with a solution of the acid in fourteen times its volume of alcohol. Red colors are particularly well preserved.

—Priceite is a borate of lime, and was named twenty years ago by Profs. Dana Silliman in honor of Prof. Thomas Price of San Francisco. Borax is made by boiling it with carbonate of soda. A discovery of Priceite in large quantity is just reported from Curry County, Oregon. Deposits of the same mineral are found in Turkey and shipped to London, where it sells as "Turkey borate."

—Anew tanning agent has been obtainedby digesting coal dust with caustic soda at a boil, and neutralizing the resulting liquor with hydrochrolic acid. The inventor calls it pyrofuscine, and considers that while the new process is more complicated than the usual tanning processes, it is fifty per cent. cheaper than the bark process, and twenty to thirty per cent. cheaper than the alum process.

—One of the chief difficulties with electric locomotives has been the trouble and danger of intrusting the delicate and easily disturbed mechanism of such a motor to fresh and unskilled hands. This, however, is believed to have been overcome, in a great measure, by providing a switch board, entirely enclosed, and in which a single motion of the lever causes the motor to move forward or backward, or remain stationary, and regulates the speed at which it shall run.

—A very good and sensitive barometer may be made by gluing together strips of red cedar and seasoned pine. A strip of cedar about thirty inches long, one and one-half inches wide and one-eighth of an inch thick, is cut with the grain, and to one side of it must be glued strips of pine of equal thickness, with the grain running across that of the cedar. This combination is set on end, and will, according to the state of the weather, be found to have bent over on one side or the other, and this may be determined by trial.—Manufacturers' Gazette.

SECRETS OF SUCCESS.

A Self-Made Man Tells How to Acquire Fame and Fortune.

Mr. O. W. Potter, President of the North Chicago Rolling Mills Company, said:

"In my experience good health is important to success. Next, get something to do, and do that something just as well as you know how, and try to know how to do it in the best possible manner, and then improve on that all the time. Make your employer feel that his business is your business, and do that by being always on hand and ready and willing to do your part, and don't wait to be told what your part is, but rather be hunting up work to do, instead of having somebody hunting you up to have you do your work, and when the time for your work to begin has arrived, be at your post and ready for your work, not ready to begin getting ready to work, and use up ten or fifteen minutes of your employer's time in the morning and then as much more at night, by getting ready to walk away at exactly the stroke of the clock; rather be ahead in the morning and behind in the evening than the reverse. Employers don't forget such persons when the time for promotion comes, and if one adopts the being late policy in the catching of trains they will get left, and the same is true in their business

"Live within your income always.

"What you save invest in something that will add to your income.

"Let liquor alone. Let tobacco alone. Let Sunday find you at church once during the day sure, and twice won't hurt you any.

"Work all the time and work with all the ability you have, and try to have all the ability there is to be had in the business in which you are engaged, and stick to your business. If it wants you at four o'clock in the morning be there; if at midnight go.

"Don't be too anxious to forget your business when you have closed the door of store, office or shop behind you; if you do, the business may forget you.

"There is no certainty the above prescriptions, however carefully prepared and faithfully complied with, will always insure success, but it is fairly certain that a general disregard of them will not add to one's happiness or prosperity."—Chicago Journal.

THE MOUND-BUILDERS.

Plausible Propositions in Regard to Ancient Society in Tennessee.

Patient and systematic research, a vast accumulation of valuable material, and a thorough analysis of facts and theories by competent authority, have finally unraveled nearly all the secrets of these works and graves, until their origin and the mysteries of their construction and of ancient domestic life in Tennessee—and, indeed, elsewhere in the Mississippi valley—represented by them are nearly as well known as the life and history of the modern Indians.

The conclusions reached (often unwillingly) as the result of these investigations in all departments of research, historic, ethnologic and traditional, may be briefly stated as follows:

1.—The progress made by these ancient tribes in the direction of civilization or semi-civilization has been over-estimated. The stone-grave race and the builders of ancient mounds and earth-works in Tennessee and probably in the Mississippi valley were Indians, North American Indians, probably the ancestors of the Southern red or copper-colored Indians found by the whites in this general section, a race formerly living under conditions of life somewhat different from that of the more nomadic hunting tribes of Indians, but not differing from them in the essential characteristics of the Indian race.

2.—The interesting collections of mounds, earth-works and stone-graves found in Tennessee and Southern Kentucky are simply the remains of ancient fortified towns, villages and settlements, once inhabited by tribes of Indians more devoted to agriculture and more stationary in their habits than the hunting tribes generally known to the whites.

3.—No single implement or article of manufacture or earth-work or defensive work has been found among their remains indicating intelligence or advancement in civilization beyond that of other Indians having intercourse with the whites within the historic period.

4.—The accumulation of dense population in favored localities, and progress made toward civilization, were probably the results of periods of repose and peace that enabled these tribes to collect in more permanent habitations, and to pursue for a time more peaceful modes of life than some of their neighbors and successors.

5.—These periods of peace and advancement were probably succeeded by years of wars, invasions, migrations, or changes which arrested the limited developement in the arts of peace and civilization, and left the native tribes in the status in which they were found by the whites.

These propositions I am satisfied can be successfully maintained, and will afford the most reasonable solution of archæological problems long in controversy.

If we could have been given a glimpse of the fair valley of the Cumberland in 1492, the date of America's discovery, there can scarcely be a doubt but that we would have found many of these ancient settlements full of busy life, and we could have learned the story of the mounds and graves from some of their own builders; but nearly three centuries elapsed before the pioneers of civilization reached the confines of Tennessee.—General Thurston, in Magazine of American History.

MAKE YOURSELF FELT.

Bob Burdette Gives Some Practical Advice to Young Men.

My son, you may not be missed a great deal by a very wide circle of people when you die. It won't be necessary for you to leave much money for a tombstone. The few people who love you, who tenderly and dearly and truly love you, will know which mound covers your sleeping figure, and they can find it just by the ferns and grasses that wave above it; and a monument ninety feet high won't make strangers care for you, or make them love you, or make them remember you. You may not be missed a great deal by very many people when you die, my boy; but that isn't what you want to think about. You want to make yourself felt and noticed while you are here. That's what you want to do. And that is more than most men do. Just run your eye over this paragraph again, if you have time, and think over it a little while you are waiting for morning service to begin. Now and then you will meet a man who actually rejoices, in a mean envious sort of a way, to think that in a few years his more popular, prosperous, successful neighbor will be dead and forgotten. It may be true. The big, wide world is so busy with the living, that she does seem to forget her children when they fall asleep. But you will notice that the man who rejoices in this is really a man whom she has forgotten while he yet lives; who is not felt or heard in the world at all. Now, do you go ahead, my boy, and don't stop to wonder if the world will remember you and miss you one hundred years from now. Little you'll care for this old world in a hundred years from now; Heaven grant it may be under your feet then! You just go ahead and make yourself felt now. When you are gone the world will get along without you, my boy; but while you are here do you make it understand that you are running part of this show yourself, if it is nothing more than standing at the tent-door, and directing the people to pass to the right, and move along in front of the cages. —*R. Toilet Recipes of Ancient Egypt.

Curious hair recipes occur on some of the papyri, some of which are very absurd. One to prevent the hair from turning gray directs that a salve should be made from the blood of a black calf cooked in oil; in another that of a black bull is preferred for the same object. Evidently the color of the animal was to pass through the salve into the hair. In another place we read of the tooth of a donkey dipped in honey being used for really strengthening the hair; and the ingredients for an ingenious compound are given for injuring the hair of a rival, and the counter-remedy to be used by those who think their hair-oil has been tampered with by a suspicious friend. Cakes of some composition which absorbed oil were always placed on the heads of the guests at least, and from them the oil gradually trickled down through the hair. A most disagreeable practice this may seem to us, but to them it appears to have given great pleasure; and with the Egyptians as well as with the Hebrews, oil was symbolical of joy and gladness. Rouge and other coloring substances were used by women of Egypt to enhance, as they thought, their beauty; the eyes had often a green line under them; the lashes and eyebrows were penciled in black; and, as in modern Egypt, the nails were always stained red with a preparation from the henna plant.—Woman's World.

READING FOR THE YOUNG.

"HO, FOR SLUMBERLAND!"

A little song for bedtime,
When, robed in gowns of white,
All sleepy little children
Set sail across the night
For that pleasant, pleasant country,
Where the pretty dream-flowers blow,
'Twixt the sunset and the sunrise,
"For the Slumber Islands, ho!

When the little ones get drowsy
And heavy lids droop down
To hide blue eyes and black eyes,
Gray eyes and eyes of brown,
A thousand boats for Dreamland
Are waiting in a row,
And the ferrymen are calling:
"For the Slumber Islands, ho!"

Then the sleepy little children
Fill the boats along the shore,
And go sailing off to Dreamland;
And the dipping of the oar
In the Sea of Sleep makes music
That the children only know
When they answer to the boatmen's
"For the Slumber Islands, ho!"

Oh! take a kiss, my darlings,
Ere you sail away from me
In the boat of dreams that's waiting
To bear you o'er the sea;
Take a kiss and give one,
And then away you go
A-sailing into Dreamland,
"For the Slumber Islands, ho!"

LITTLE MARJORIE.

The Struggle Between Her Love for Her Dolls and Her Sense of Another's Need.

"Why, what is the matter with my little Marjorie?" said Aunt Sophie in surprise, as she entered the sitting-room one bright spring afternoon.

Marjorie was sitting on the floor in the corner, with a very unhappy face. Before her, ranged in a row, were her six dolls, the treasures of her heart, at whom she was gazing so mournfully it really seemed as if her dejection had communicated itself to them, and their very attitudes expressed misery.

"Why, it isn't a funeral, is it?" went on Aunt Sophie, coming up to the group in haste.

"Most as bad," answered Marjorie, lifting tearful brown eyes. "I'm trying to think which one to give away."

"To give away! Why I thought you loved your dollies far too well to think of such a thing!" cried Auntie.

"So I do. That's just what makes me feel so bad," answered the quivering lips. "Nobody loves them the way I do!"

"Well, tell me all about it, girlie," and Aunt Sophie sat down on the floor and put her arms around Majorie. "Why must you give away any of them?"

"Well, you know Hitty, don't you?", said Marjorie, nestling close to Auntie, and finding it a great relief to confide her troubles, like all the rest of us.

"That little Irish girl round the corner? the one with the queer eyes—yes."

"She's broke her leg," went on the child, with a great sigh. "An' she'll have to lie in bed a long time. An' she hasn't any dollies, Auntie; not a one, even. All little girls need dollies, you know, 'specially when they're sick. What could I do without Ethel' when I had the measles, don't you know?"

"Of course I do. She was a real comfort, wasn't she?" and Aunt Sophie regarded Ethel (who had seen her best days and was now rather dilapidated) with kindly amusement.

"So then," Marjorie went on, "I thought I ought to give her one of mine. 'Tisn't right for me to have six and her not have any, Auntie—"

"No," assented Auntie. "And then?"

"Then I got 'em out, and I—O, Auntie! I don't want to give away any of them! They're my own little children. How can I give them to some body else? Look at Ethel now," picking up the eldest of the flock and holding her tenderly. "She was the first one, an' she was so pretty once. An' she's lost the end of her nose, an' her cheeks are all washed off, and her hair's getting thin, an' one arm's loose. Nobody but me would love her now. I can't let her go."

"An' then there's the twins. You gave me those, an' the're named for you an' mamma. I couldn't separate them—they've always been together, an' 'twould break their hearts—I 'most know it would. And they're so cunning, Auntie. You couldn't give the twins away, could you, now?" entreatingly.

"And here's Josephine. She's such an invalid, it wouldn't ever be right to send her away—she's lost her leg, you know, where Beppo chewed it up—'specially to a little girl that's broke her's. And Hitty couldn't take care of her as I can. She needs lots of care, poor thing! I take her out every day; and I can't let her go.

"And Ned—he's my only boy"—looking at him lovingly. "I couldn't spare Ned."

"Well, how about Seraphina?" said Aunt Sophie, quietly.

Seraphina was the latest arrival among the dolls, a very charming young creature indeed, golden-haired and brown-eyed, with cheeks like a blush rose. She was exquisitely dressed, from the dainty bonnet to the pretty bronze boots, with a wonderful wardrobe in reserve. Aunt Sophie knew she was the pride of Marjorie's heart, and wondered what the child would say.

"Seraphina," repeated Marjorie, slowly. "Well, perhaps, Seraphina ought to be the one to go. She's well and strong, and she's so pretty, I know 'twould 'most stop Hitty's leg from aching just to look at her. And she hasn't lived here so long; so, perhaps, she wouldn't miss me so much—but I should miss her," poor Marjorie broke off suddenly. "Aunt Sophie, I love her dearly! Little girls can't give away their own dollies any more'n mothers their own little children."

And here Marjorie really began to cry a little.

Aunt Sophie didn't say any thing. She only held the little girl close, and stroked the soft hair gently, and presently the child said in a penitent little voice: "But I want Hitty to have one, Auntie—I truly do. Do you think it would be selfish if I keep all my six, and take my little gold dollar that Uncle Jack gave me, and buy her a new dolly for her own self? He said to buy any thing I wanted, Uncle Jack did, and I'd rather give it to Hitty than have any thing myself. Would that do, do you think?"

"That will do charmingly," said Aunt Sophie, kissing her. "Come, let's go up stairs and ask mamma this very minute, and we'll go down street and buy the young lady at once. Then we can dress her and take her down to Hitty directly. Let me see! suppose we measure Seraphina, and get one that can wear some of her clothes; she has so many. You're willing to sacrifice one of Seraphina's dresses, aren't you?"

"Oh, clothes!" cried Marjorie, eagerly; "she can have them all. Tisn't her clothes I care about, it's Seraphina."

"Well, we don't want them all," said Auntie, laughing. "There, now, here's just the thing—this blue sailor suit. Isn't there a hat for it? Yes, I thought so. Now get me the tape-measure and run and ask mamma while I see how tall she is."

So in a few minutes Aunt Sophie and her little niece were in the car on their way down town. They had a great hunt for the new dolly to find one just tall enough and plump enough, but not too plump. At last appeared a fair one, with golden locks, a big, blue-eyed creature that Marjorie called Ethelinda on the spot, and when they took her home, Seraphina's clothes fitted her perfectly, and she was soon arrayed in a pretty set of under-clothing complete, with a pair of boots on, and then the dainty sailor dress, with broad white collar, pretty red tie and jaunty hat, and was pronounced quite charming.

Then they took her down to little Hitty's house, not forgetting some good things for the sick child to eat. And very pretty it was to see the rapture with which Ethelinda was received, and Marjorie's own delight in it when they came away and left little Hitty hugging the doll closely to her, and smiling down at Ethelinda like a little mother.

That night, when all the dollies had been undressed and laid in their own little beds, with an extra kiss for poor Josephine, who could never be like the rest any more, Marjorie went up-stairs to her own little room, carrying the faithful Ethel, who always slept with her, and whispering to her softly: "Ethelinda's a great deal handsomer than you, you poor old thing; but she's Hitty's, and I love you a thousand times better because you're mine!"—N. Y. Observer.

MINNIE DID IT.

The Reason Why She Could Not Sleep—How Mamma Knew.

She sat up in bed. The curtain was drawn up, and she saw the moon, and it looked as if it were laughing at her.

"You needn't look at me, Moon," she said, "you don't know about it, you can't see in the daytime. Besides I am going to sleep."

She lay down, and tried to go to sleep. Her clock on the mantel went "tick-tock, tick-tock." She generally liked to hear it. But to-night it sounded just as if it said: "I-know, I-know, I-know."

"You don't know, either," said Minnie, opening her eyes wide. "You weren't there, you old thing! you were up-stairs."

Her loud noise awoke the parrot. He took his head from under his wing, and cried out: "Polly did!"

"That's a wicked story, you naughty bird!" said Minnie. "You were in grandma's room, so now!"

Then Minnie tried to go to sleep again. She lay down and counted white sheep, just as grandma said she did, when she couldn't sleep. But there was a big lump in her throat. "O, I wish I hadn't."

Pretty soon there came a very soft patter of four little feet, and her pussy jumped up on the bed, kissed Minnie's cheek, and then began to "pur-r-r-r, pur-r-r-r." It was very queer, but that, too, sounded as if pussy said: "I-know, I-know."

"Yes, you do know, kitty," said Minnie, and then she threw her arms around kitty's neck and cried bitterly. "And—I guess—I want—to—see—my—mamma!"

Mamma opened her arms when she saw the little weeping girl coming, and then Minnie told her miserable story.

"I was awful naughty, mamma, but I did want the custard-pie so bad, and so I ate it up, 'most a whole pie, and then, I—I—O, I don't want to tell, but I 'spect I must—I shut kitty in the pantry to make you think she did it. But I'm truly sorry, mamma."

Then mamma told Minnie that she had known all about it. But she had hoped that the little daughter would be brave enough to tell her all about it herself.

"But, mamma," she asked, "how did you know it wasn't kitty?"

"Because kitty would never have left a spoon in the pie," replied mamma, smiling.—Little Men and Women.

—The best authorities have settled upon a few staple products which contain food in a high degree. First and foremost is milk. It is no economy to scant the supply of milk used by a family. It often takes the place of other food to a large extent. Butter is wholesome fat, and cream a palatable form in which to take fat when it is especially needed by the system. Cheese is very nutritious. The cereal foods have varying values. They are numerous in variety, and, by making the different preparations of oat, wheat, barley and corn the staple breakfast foods, a housewife can scarcely go amiss.—Christian at Work.

SLEEPING AFTER MEALS.

The Natural Way of Aiding Digestion and Strengthening the Brain.

There is a widespread superstition, cherished by the great majority of the people; that to sleep immediately after they have taken food is to endanger health, to favor the onset of apoplexy, etc.—a superstition based on the assumption that during sleep the brain is normally congested. There is, no doubt, such a thing as congestive sleep, but during normal sleep the brain is anæmic. When a person has taken a fairly abundant lunch or dinner the stomach demands a special influx of blood wherewith to accomplish its work of digestion; no organ can more easily comply with that demand than the brain, which, when in full activity, is suffused with a maximum amount of the vital fluid. But a derivation of blood from the brain to the stomach can only take place, except in exceptionally full-blooded and vigorous persons, on the condition that the cerebral functions be meanwhile partially or wholly suspended. Hence many people after taking dinner feel indisposed for mental action, and not a few long for sleep. The already partially anæmic brain would fain yield up to the stomach a still further supply of blood and yeild itself up to refreshing sleep. Doing so it gains new strength; meanwhile digestion proceeds energetically; and, soon, body and mind are again equipped to continue in full force the battle of life. But superstition, the child of ignorance, intervenes, declares that sleep during digestion is dangerous, admonishes the would-be sleepers to struggle against their perilous inclination, and, though telling them that after dinner they may sit awhile, assures them of the adage, "After supper walk a mile." The millions of its victims continue, therefore, the strife to which it condemns them, and ignore the suggestions offered to them by the lower animals, who have always practiced the lessons of sound physiology by sleeping after feeding whenever they are allowed to do so. Hence the human brain and human stomach of such victims contend with each other during the digestive process; the brain, impelled by superstition, strives to work and demands blood to work with, while the stomach, stimulated by its contents, strives to carry on its marvelous chemistry, and demands an ample supply of blood for the purpose. The result of the struggle is that neither is able to do its work well; the brain is enfeebled by being denied its natural rest during the digestive process, and the healthy function of the stomach degenerates into dyspepsia.—Westminster Review.

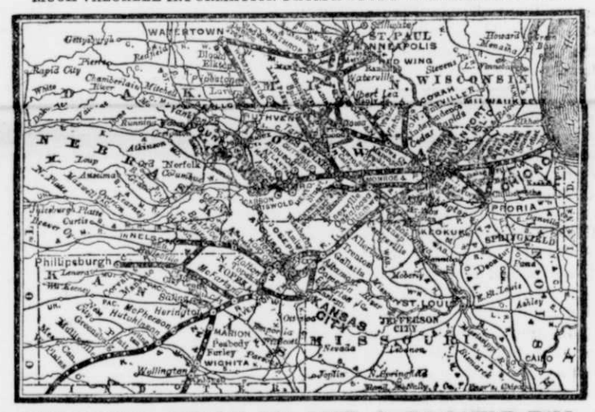
TESTIMONIALS WORTHY OF CONFIDENCE.



My daughter Maud has used Hibbard's Rheumatic Syrup and Plasters, which you so strongly recommended her to try for inflammatory rheumatism. Her limbs were badly swollen, and the poor girl was in terrible agony. In the midst of the pain we wound the Plasters about her limbs, and, as a result the swelling was reduced and she became quiet and rested. The syrup corrected her indigestion, cleansed the rheumatic poison from her blood, and she is now able to be around the house. Hibbard's Rheumatic Syrup and Plasters are remedies of great merit. REV. FOR PRESIDENT,
BENJAMIN H. HARRISON,
OF INDIANA.

FOR VICE-PRESIDENT,
LEVI P. MORTON,
OF NEW YORK.

FOR CONGRESS,
Sixth Congressional District,
LEWIS E. McCOMAS.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 1, 1888.

Gen. Kelly's sojourn in the mountains has been the means of restoring his health sufficiently to enable him to attend the Reunion of the Society of the Army of West Virginia, at Columbus, Ohio, on the 11th, 12th and 13th of September. He will leave here probably on Saturday, the 8th. inst., spend Sunday in Wheeling and reach Columbus Monday evening, the 10th. He will be accompanied by his wife and grand-daughter and Mrs. Genl. Crook, who will meet the General at Columbus.

The Baltimore Sun, commenting editorially on Mr. McComas' renomination says: "Notwithstanding his partisan course on the issue between the two great parties, the Sun has frequently had occasion to commend the energy, ability and zeal with which Mr. McComas has discharged the duties of his important position and his untiring efforts to promote the interests not only of his immediate constituents, but of the State at large. He has deservedly occupied a prominent place on the Republican side of the House and is one of the most active and useful of the Republican members."

The ... to say, will not soon be tried in Garrett county. It was thought it would just transfix the country voter two years ago and cause a grand stampede to Baughman. It turned out to be a grand fizzle as a campaign dodge. Thousands came, saw but failed to be conquered. The sky-rockets went up and so did a pretty fair sized pile of greenbacks with it; a little bit bigger pile than we will soon see again, and we feel pretty safe in saying that there will be a very hungry and a very thirsty set of boys this fall. Western Maryland has been abandoned to its idols and it is generally conceded that Mr. Douglass will have a very lonesome time this fall.

Spiked Guns.

Four years ago the cry on the streets was, "turn the rascals out." We had it dinned into our ears from every source. At night on the way home from gatherings of any kind men and boys made night hideous with the cry. That gun is spiked, and effectually. Twenty-five years of Republican rule, with its twenty-five years of bitter opposition from Democratic newspapers and campaign orators, led people to believe that widespread corruption would be found, that Republican office-holders were all scoundrels and thieves, and that the country was fast going to the "demnition-bowwows." So oft repeated were these cries that Republicans by thousand concluded that it was time for a change, and by voting for Cleveland elected him. They have had a change, and have had enough of it. That gun is spiked for this campaign.

The Great Backbone Act.

Four years ago Cleveland was to be the coming Reformer with a big R. The vetoing of pension bills, with messages to Congress reciting the people's grievances, and every now and then a veto message of the "sky-rocket order," had prepared the gazing admirer of the great "I" to look for the culminatory act of all when it came to the veto of the immense River and Harbor bill. That bill has extinguished both the surplus and the great cry of the Democratic party for free trade at one fell swoop. With eyes open and mouth agape we watched for the great backbone act of the present administration that was to electrify the country and cast all previous "Backbone acts" into the shade. We looked in vain. Something surely is wrong. Has the great "Backbone," of which we have heard so much got tired? Possibly in trying to beat the record in vetoing pensions the "Back" has got sprained. Who knows. Privately we are of the opinion that the great "I" is preparing for a new role of bareback-riding, and as such we suggest it be called on the show-bills "Straddling the Tariff." To prepare wating admirers for the forthcoming letter of acceptance for what is in store for them, we take the great liberty to say that we have been privately informed that the chief actor will appear in the usual tights, with immense capital "I's" emblazoned fore and aft, the porous plaster properly concealed. The steed "Tariff," frequently straddled heretofore, but never successfully ridden the entire circuit of the ring, will be brilliantly comparisoned, emblazoned on one side "Free Trade," and on the other "Protection." The free trade side will be led by Scott and Brice, the off side by Gorman and Barnum. It is thought the horse will thus be got into the ring safely, and the entertaidment finished amid the blasts of trumpets and acclamations of the crowd. This performance, it is thought, will eclipse all former acts of this nature, and it is confidently predicted that it will finish up once for all the Republican crowd who have treated the great performer of the age with ridicule.

The Farmers and the Tariff.

It is often asserted by "revenue reformers" that the farmers are taxed by a protective tariff for the sole benefit of the manufacturers, while they themselves have no protection at all. The assertion is false. The farmer as well as the factory operative and the miner is a beneficiary of the protective system. This false statement about the farmer has been so often made by the free traders that it is time to counteract it with facts. Let us see in what respects the farmer is protected. His stock is protected by a duty of 20 per cent. His barley is protected by a duty of 10 cents a bushel, and his bran and mill-feed by a duty of 20 per cent. The following table shows what other protection he receives:

Buckwheat	10 per cent.
Corn	10 cents a bushel
Oats	10 cents a bushel
Rye	10 cents a bushel
Wheat	20 cents a bushel
Bark for tanning	20 per cent.
Flowers	10 per cent.
Flax, hackled	$40 per ton
Flax, not hackled	$20 a ton.
Flax, straw	$25 per ton.
Flax, tow	$10 per ton
Hemp, tow	$10 per ton
Manilla and other like substitutes for hemp	30 per ton
Jute	20 per cent.
Jute butts	8 per ton
Sisal grass	$15 per ton
Other vegetable substances not specially enumerated	$15 per ton
Fruits (average)	30 per cent.
Glucose or grape sugar	20 per cent.
Hair curled (except of hogs)	25 per cent.
Hay	$2 a ton
Honey	20 cents per gallon
Hops	8 cents per pound
Vegetable oils (average)	25 per cent.
Provisions (meat and dairy products average	24-44 per cent.
Rice (average)	61 per cent.
Seeds (average)	20-36 per cent.
Sugar (average)	82 per cent.
Sugar cane	10 per cent.
Tobacco leaf for wrappers, not stemmed	75c. per lb.
Tobacco leaf, for wrappers, stemmed	$1 per lb.
Tobacco leaf, all other, not stemmed	35c. per lb.
Tobacco leaf, stemmed	40c. per lb.
Tobacco stems	15c. per lb.
Tobacco not specially enumerated	30 per cent.
Vegetables (average)	24 per cent.
Wools (average)	36 per cent.

This table is a complete answer to the assertions made so frequently by the free traders that the farmer is not protected by the tariff. As a matter of fact the farmer is quite as carefully considered as the manufacturers and the workingmen. The Mills bill attacks some of the most important agricultural interests of the country, and interests that flourish in all sections.

A Political Dodge.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 24.—The message of the President asking for authority to declare further retaliatory measures than those given him by the act of March 31, 1887, against Canada in the matter of transporting goods in hand to and from Canadian ports, and in the transportation of Canadian goods on American canals, created a sensation at the Capitol.

There was a general expression of Republican opinion that the President already had all the authority he needed to declare retaliatory measures Canada in the act passed by last Congress, but certain Democrats denied this, saying that the law gave him authority in certain contingencies, such as continued outrages on American vessels, but it did not give him the power he now asked to prohibit the transportation of Canadian goods in bond through the United States, nor to charge tolls on American canals similar to those charged Americans on the Welland Canal.

The paper is regarded as a political document pure and simple. It is a bold effort to regain the prestige lost by the Democrats in the new England and Northwestern States, and to divert the attention of the people at large from the discouraging features of Mills free trade bill.

Democratic Desperation.

ED. REPUBLICAN:—Eight years ago the Democracy seeing defeat staring them full in the face had resort to a desperate method. A letter was procured to be written to imitate Garfield's hand writing, wherein he was made to say that he was in favor of unlimited Chinese immigration, and of thus forcing down the wages of labor to the lowest possible scale. Having made the letter say what they desired it to say, they procured a villian to swear to it, and the Democratic speakers and Democratic papers all over the country declared that the letter was genuine, and to give all possible countenance and responsibility to the lie, the Democratic National Committee telegraphed it all over the county, declared it authentic, had reams and tons of large hand bills struck off, and had all the public places in the county, especially in the large cities and on the Pacific Coast, placarded with this perjured villian's lies, and sought to carry the election by it.

So, also, four years ago, every malicious publication that could be invented about Blaine was fully indulged in, and generally circulated until by dint of bare, persistant, systematic lying, a great many people were made believe that Blaine was the worst scoundrel that went unhung, and by a campaign of vituperation and slander they succeeded in getting their man count in.

And now in the beginning of the present canvasss, realizing, no doubt, Cleveland's vulnerable record, the Democrats begun by saying that this was to be a clean canvass, there was to be no mud-slinging or villifying of candidates. It was to be a battle of principle, conducted on a high plane. But the average Democratic politician can no more conduct a clean canvass than he can be clean himself.

The first thing they did was to go back to their old characteristic methods. They told a lie and swore to it, and are trying to elect their man by regulation methods.

As in the Morey forgery in 1880 they made Garfield say what they wished he had said, so now they make Harrison say that a dollar a day is enough for a laboring man, and that if he is not satisfied with that he ought to be shot down.

Now anybody with sense enough to come in when it rains must know that no public man would make such a declaration, even if it could in any way be to his interest to reduce the working people's wages. But the absurdity of the charge does not seem to make any difference.

The Democratic campaign ... his party to be as false on general principles as anything he can utter, and acting on the theory that a lie well stuck to is as good as the truth, he depends on the ignorance of his dupes and continues to reiterate the the charge. Harrison promptly offers a thousand dollars for the proof, but with the Democratic politician that makes no sort of differeuce; they stick to the lie though proven.

Now there are among the Democratic voters a great many good and honest citizens who would scorn to stoop to crooked methods, much less to lying and perjury, and yet strange as it may seem, they go on voting the Democratic ticket. If they could believe but for a moment that there is honor or integrity among the Democratic leaders, or that they are controlled by honorable motives, or that they care anything for the common people only as a means to get a living, let them take a casual glance at the condition of Garrett county today. Let them take a retrospect of what Democratic legislation in Maryland, and especially for Garrett county, has done for their material welfare; and let them take that as an example of what it would do for the county at large.

Let us look at the result of Democratic management in our school board; in our "Legislative" road system, and in the convenience of the political divisions of the county, so as to accommodate the voters of the county, for it is by the contemplation of familiar examples that we learn our most important and valuable lessons.

The writer will endeavor to elucidate some of these things, known of all men, in succeeding communications.

Yours truly,

W.

The Rockville Convention.

Baltimore American.

Hon. Louis E. McComas was renominated by Republicans at Rockville Thursday of last week for Congress. The convention was held in the town hall. Benjamin H. Miller, of Montgomery, called the convention to order. On motion of E. E. Gettinger, of Frederick, David W. Sloan, of Allegany, was elected temporary chairman, B. F. Noyes was elected temporary secretary.

Messrs. George W. Snyder, of Allegany, A. P. Beatty, of Frederick, Jonas Gnagey, of Garrett, Arthur Stadler, of Montgomery, and Dr. Charles D. Baker, of Washington, were named as the committee on credentials. Messrs. J. W. Shuck, of Allegany, E. A. Gettinger, of Frederick, Dr. H. M. Kemp, of Garrett, Captain John McDonald, of Montgomery, and Raleigh Sherman, of Washington, were named as the committee on resolutions.

There being no contested delegation, the Committee on Credentials, through its chairman, Dr. Baker, reported very promptly, admitting the sitting delegates, and recommending the election of the temporary officers as permanent. The report was adopted.

THE RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED.

Mr. Gettinger, as chairman of the Committee on Resolutions, reported the following, which were adopted:

Resolved by the Republicans of the Sixth Congressional District of Maryland, in convention assembled, That we reaffirm our devotion to the principles of the Republican party as expressed in the platform of the National Republican Convention at Chicago.

Resolved, That we heartily endorse the nomination of Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, and Levi P. Morton, of New York, for President of the United States, and that we hail with pleasure the indications from all sections of our country of the triumphant election of these loyal exponents of the doctrine of protection to American labor and industries.

Resolved, That we heartily commend the record of our present Congressman, who fought as successfully for the life of an American citizen in Equador as for the education of children in Alaska; who spoke for the eight-hour law for those in government employ, and amended the Contract Labor law to prevent the importation of foreign contract labor; who had coal stricken from the free list; who had passed the only pension bill over the President's veto; who secured to Western Maryland the fast mail system, and who faithfully stood at his post through the long struggle against the Mills bill, in behalf of American home markets and wages.

The preliminary conventionalities being thus disposed of, the convention now settled down to its real work, and the call of counties was begun for nomination. George A. Pearre, of Allegany, was the first speaker. He paid a glowing tribute to Mr. Blaine as a true American, and after touching upon other points nominated George L. Wellington, of Allegany county. Robert W. McMichael, of Allegany county, seconded the nomination.

The nomination speeches for Mr. McComas followed. They were brief, his friends seeming to consider it unnecessary. Frederick, when called, asked to be passed over. Dr. Kemp, of Garrett, said simply: "Garrett has the honor to present a gentleman who needs no eulogy. Garrett has the honor to name Louis E. McComas."

Capt. McDonald, on behalf of Montgomery, seconded Mr. McComas' nomination.

Raliegh Sherman, of Washington, said: "At this, the threshold of the campaign, it becomes us to be wise in our action. We cannot but share the enthusiasm of the delegates of Allegany, but this is the time of all times when we should select the man who is the most available, and who is sure to carry us to victory."

But one ballot was necessary. Allegany gave her five votes for Wellington, and the other counties voted solidly for McComas, giving him eighteen votes. Messrs. George A. Pearre, of Allegany, Peter Lugenbeel, of Frederick; Jonas Gnagey of Garrett; F. B. Noyes, of Montgomery, and J. W. Cable, of Washington, were appointed a committee to inform Mr. McComas of his nomination, and the convention then took a recess.

THE SPEECH OF THE NOMINEE.

About three o'clock the meeting reassembled, and the appearance of Mr. McComas, Gen. David B. Henderson, of Iowa, and Hon. J. G. Hopkins, of Illinois, was greeted with hearty applause. Mr. McComas was conducted to the platform. After thanking the convention for the honor conferred on him, he continued.

"We have learned to fight odds, and terrible odds at that, and we feel willing to fight them again, and we are confident of success. I will be confined to my duties in Washington, and will be but seldom to meet you personally. Fighting against Mr. Gorman and his complete organization, and against the Bourbon Democracy of Maryland, we will want to work in all earnest. We are going to carry every county in the district except Montgomery. I believe the day is coming when we are going to have a great improvement in Montgomery. Along the southern borders of the county, we are trying to have an influx of earnest Republicans, and by and by the Whig county of Montgomery, which voted for the older Harrison will at least be sorry she didn't vote for the younger Harrison."

THE RATIFICATION NEETING

was next organized with Mr. Columbus Purden as chairman, and a number of prominent citizens as vice-president and secretaries.

General Henderson was the first speaker. "You all seem to be a happy-looking set of fellows," he said, pleasantly, "and McComas looks happy, too. And you have reason to be, sir. It is a great compliment to be chosen to the greatest legislative body on earth. Mac's happy, you're happy, and I'm happy. We're all happy, except the Democrats. They're not happy."

General Henderson then talked to the meeting in an easy, colloquial way. He spoke of his first acquaintance with Mr. McComas, and of their continued service with him on the Appropriation Committee. He referred to the unusual compliment paid Mr. McComas in his appointment to that committee in his second term.

Mr. Hopkins endorsed all the kind things said of Mr. McComas, and he spoke, too, of the promptness with which Mr. McComas responded to all the calls of his constituents.

It is an interesting coincidence that three Republican members of the Appropriations Committee—Messrs. McComas, Henderson and Butterworth—were all three nominated yesterday.

Telegrams were received from the nominating conventions at Cincinnati and Waterloo, Iowa, congratulating the convention on its nomination of Mr. McComas and similar dispatches were sent to each convention.

Mrs. Arthur Stabler and Mrs. B. H. Miller sent some very beautiful bouquets of flowers, which were presented to the speakers.

Allegany, though feeling a little sore over the defeat of its own Mr. Wellington, is expected to fall into line and give Mr. McComas her biggest majority.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Aug. 27, 1888.—Cleveland's message on the rejection of the fisheries treaty is still the all absorbing topic of conversation here. It is a most remarkable document; remarkable for the complete somersault which he has taken on this Canadian question; remarkable for its tone of belligerence, and remarkable for pure unadulterated gall (no other word expresses it so well.) He has suddenly discovered that the Republicans were on the popular side of the question, and forthwith he proceeds to try and get a step in advance of the Senate. This would be all very good, if it were not for the damaging fact that what is known as the "Retaliation act" has been on our statute books for eighteen months; this act places unlimited power in the hands of the President for the protection of American interests, and while in his message he acknowledges that he has known of a number of instances in which Americans have been unjustly treated by Canadians, he has done nothing, has not even protested against such treatment. Now he asks for additional power to retaliate, and this is just where he has made a miscalculation. He has no intention of of retaliating, he only wants to make a little political capital, but he will find that the Republican Senate will not be one whit behind the Democratic House in giving him all the authority he wants, notwithstanding the fact that he has lacked the necessary courage to make use of the power unanimously given him by Congress a year and a half ago. When it comes to protecting American interests, the Republicans are always in the lead, now as in the past. If Cleveland and the Democrats want to join the ranks, even at this, the eleventh hour, and add their mite to the good cause, the Republican veterans will give them a cordial welcome, but they cannot rule the campaign.

The House is now in a deadlock on the Deficiency Appropriation bill, for want of a quorum, owing to the large number of Democrats absent from the city. The House has passed a resolution revoking all leaves, except those granted for sickness, and it is hoped to have a quorum present by the middle of the week.

Among the other regular appropriation bills still unsettled, are the Sundry Civil bill, which is still in Conference: the Army bill, which is in the same condition, the House having refused to accept the report of the conference committee, and ordered a new one. The fortification bill has passed the House, and is now in the hands of the Senate committee. If all these bills are not passed by Friday, another joint resolution extending the old appropriations, will have to be passed.

The nomination of Representative Goff for Governor of West Virginia by the Republicans has created a small panic among Democrats here. They acknowled e that the State is now a doubtful one. Mr. Goff is a very popular candidate, and deserves to be the next governor of his State.

The House committee on pensions has reduced the amount of the pension which it proposed to give Mrs. Sheridan to $3,500 a year. Representative Matson, of Indiana, voted against giving her any pension. The bill has also been reduced to the same amount by the Senate pension committee.

Senator Hoar has offered a resolution requesting the President to send to the Senate copies of all communications remonstrating with the British government against the conduct of Canada in regard to the canals; also copies of all demands made by the President for the redress of wrongs done to our fisherman. This is only a little bit of fine sarcasm on the part of the Massachusetts Senator. He knows very well that no such remonstrance or demand is in existence.

Senator Chandler used a part of two days last week in telling how the Democrats carry elections in Louisiana and Florida. The practices resorted to are enough to cause every American citizen to blush for shame; but southern Senators are always ready to defend them.

The Senate finance committee are still working on the substitute for the Mills bill, but owing to so many other important bills being before the Senate just now, the members of the committee have had little time to spare in preparing the bill.

The Democratic party never willingly assumes the responsibility for anything, so it is not at all surprising to find them denying that they are to blame for the present disgraceful state of affairs in the house. If the majority is not to blame I should like to know who is. The majority could have put a stop to granting leaves of absence at any time had they been so disposed.

Brice says, "we have all the money we need this year." Certainly. With Jay Gould, the king bee; Havemeyer, the head of the sugar trust, Scott, the leader of the coal ring; Whitney and the Standard Oil crowd; and with all the other trusts, rings and monopolies eager for Cleveland's re-election, there will be no alck of money.

Speaking of the item that the Standard Oil monopoly supports Cleveland, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat says:

"Certainly it does. The Standard is not going to work against the sugar trust, the coal pool, the whiskey ring, and the other "combines." All the trusts support Cleveland.

Mountain Lake Park.

The rain continued to fall plentifully on Tuesday evening, yet there were several more in attendance at the meeting than in the morning. Rev. B. Ison gave us a splendid talk, as he styled it, on the Christian's duty. At 10:30 Wednesday morning, the rain having ceased, there were a larger number in attendance. Rev. George Elliott, of Washington, D. C., preached one of the ablest sermons we had the pleasure of listening to for a long time. His theme was the Christian's possession. In the afternoon Rev. Murra, of Atlanta, Georgia, conducted a praise meeting. In the evening Rev. Stuard, of Moundsville, W. Va., preached a good, earnest sermon. After a short testimony meeting the services closed for the evening. Thursday morning Rev. Mr. Shaw, of Rowlesburg, preached for us. Then at two in the afternoon Miss Jennie Smith conducted a very interesting children's meeting. In the evening Rev. Calahan, of Kentucky, preached. There was one at the altar. Friday morning at the close of a very interesting praise meeting, Dr. Masden preached a very able sermon. All were then invited to surround the altar where they felt a conscious need. The altar was filled and many were kneeling at the chairs in front. Another very interesting meeting was held for the children by Miss Jennie Smith at two. At three Rev. Orr preached. The altar was again filled. In the evening Rev. Stuard preached for us again. When the invitation was given for persons to come forward some who had not been there during the day accepted the invitation. Saturday morning found quite a number of new faces present. Dr. Boyl, from near McKeesport, and several others who came with him, added greatly to the interest of the meeting. The regular meetings were held during the day. The last quarterly conference was held at two o'clock. Sabbath morning the people began coming in from different parts of the country at an early hour. Many were there for the early morning service. By half-past ten the Auditorium was filled almost entirely full, while many were sitting around on chairs and seats on the outside. Many others were walking around the grounds. Dr. Boyl preached a powerful sermon, which was highly appreciated by the large audience. At two Miss Jennie Smith, assisted by others, conducted a very profitable meeting for the young people. Then at three Rev. Shope, of Baltimore, preached a very earnest and eloquent sermon. At seven-thirty Dr. Boyle preached in his earnest, pleading manner.

By taking up four collections during the entire meeting all the expenses were fully met without the gate fees.

After a very good morning meeting Monday Dr. Goucher preached. At the close of this the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered to a large number of communicants. The morning meeting was closed with so much reluctance that it was taken up again at two by Miss Jennie Smith. The interest of the meeting seemed to be intensifying, from the first to its close. In the evening Dr. Boyl preached with unusual earnestness and tenderness. Then the last invitation came to come to Jesus. There was but one responded, but she was greatly helped.

After the meeting was closed, which was certainly the best one of all, there lingered a young man just outside of the Auditorium who Miss Jennie found in a very anxious state to be saved. After some persuasion he went back into the building where singing and prayer was engaged in for some time. Before leaving for his home, near Grantsville, he felt that he could trust all his interests in the hands of God.

There were only two or three conversions as far as we can tell, yet this was a sufficient reward, not saying anything of the great number who were so wonderfully helped.

The strong probabilities are that there will be another similar meeting next year. J. A. E.

Florida Letter.

FOR THE REPUBLICAN.

MY GOOD FRIEND HAYDEN:—During all the months that have passed since my last letter to the REPUBLICAN, I have not failed to think of you, at least once every week; for every week we have enjoyed your friendly visits, bringing us always something of interest from the "old, old home." And have you wondered sometimes whether indeed Florida had finally "gone under," or whether her climate has a tendency to make one oblivious to promises given? Well, we are still some 15 feet above high tide at Switzerland, and there seems no immediate prospect of our being overwhelmed by the aqueous catastrophe foreshadowed by the learned assertion of one of your neighbors, to the effect that our whole Peninsula is surrounded by a threatening mass of water, elevated some 15 feet above the land, and kept out only by a range of unstable sand hills! Indeed, a few years residence here, banishes from one's mind all apprehension of harmful visitation by storm or flood. Do you not think it must be a delightfully quieting sensation, to gaze daily upon this, in (some respects, grandest river on the globe, in the consciousness that a rise of eve, so much as three inches, aside from tidal variation, is never to be feared? Compare this quiet feeling of assurance with that possessing the thousands of robbed, ruined, homeless and begard souls along the grand but fierce Monongahela and its tributaries, and tell me, is there not something sweet about life in far-away Florida? How dreadful are the reports of sudden, devastating storms and floods over all the North and West! And the Old World is faring no better. Life has its hardships and drawbacks here; this no honest Floridian will deny but how many of the hard experiences common to your clime, are we not delivered from? I conceive that country-life in the Northern portion of our state, can be made about as quiet, comfortable, and danger free, as anywhere else in all the wide world. Winds we have, as constant and refreshing as any land; but no destructive storms: rains, too, we have, in quantity considerably above the average for the whole country, through the year; floods we know nothing of, as a ruinous visitation; though indeed a large portion of the land is submerged during the rainy season. Sicknesses also visit our homes; but how many of the sudden, acute, alarming and fatal types of disease common in higher latitudes, are here unknown, or robbed of their alarming and fatal character. City life I would neither venture upon, nor commend to a friend, coming from the North; it is for obvious reasons, so very difficult to maintain perfect sanitary conditions in our towns. But country life!—well, pity I know it to be that very many Northern sufferers are unwilling to try it.

Do you know for one thing, that the death rate of Florida is considerably lower, in proportion to population, than of any other state or territory? Figures in the Statistical Bureau at Washington will prove this. But what we now rejoice over, is this fact, namely: Florida outdoes all the world in healing or curing the afflicted, coming as health-seekers from other and sterner climes. This is our glory and boast; and it is enough! What better could the world ask?—what better could we give? For fortune-seekers Florida is not much; but for health-seekers, par excellence! A tour through the country portions of the newly-settled counties of the state, will afford to any one the pleasing fact that at least half of our population is made up of restored or partically restored invalids from the North. Many of these people are not in very comfortable circumstances, it is to be admitted; but I fancy few of them indeed, would prefer to be in Northern graves, rather than in their even indifferent Florida homes!

And, while we have room for a million more afflicted households, I trow there are as many who would, in a sanitary point of view, be wise to come.

The question frequently arises:—can a man, or family, without incurring guilt, continne to face a condition of things that must inevitably hurry him or them to premature death, while God, in His wise goodness puts it into any one's power to find a home of comfort and prolonged life through restoration from various prevalent chronic and fatal diseases, by a change of climate? So fully am I convinced that the Maker of all things has mercifully designed this singular American Peninsula to be a blessing to the world's afflicted, that, had I means, I should regard it a sacred duty to publish more fully all these, the sanitary merits of our State. And let me add this: To many a dear friend in Garrett county I should like to say, are you doing right in God's sight by denying to yourself or your suffering wife or child the blessings of restored health and prolonged life for what it will cost in money or effort to sojourn awhile or find a new home in Florida! The time is gone by when any one can say, "I know nothing about Florida." Such a confession would shame any one; for all the world has heard of the goodliness of this land. Before this reaches you the report of yellow fever in Jacksonville and all over Northern Florida will have reached you. We have had a big scare; more than half the citizens of several towns have run away, and reports of numbers sick and dead from this scourge are sent out over the land. With all this it is not quite certain that there has been a single case of yellow fever in Jacksonville. People are like sheep—easily frightened, and prone to run in one direction. Some of my neighbors have spent days in devising means to keep the plague away from Switzerland. I have remained quiet, hoeing my sweet-potatoes and planting straw-berries. We shall see whose the right to laugh will be, when a few weeks are gone. Leben sie wohl.

A Sunday Evening Adventure.

Two young girls, members of the giddy crowd staying at "Woodland," were seen wandering through the streets of Oakland last Sunday evening. They strolled along until they came to "Thayer's Tavern," where quite a collection of old maids and bachelors were assembled on the porch. To these people the girls announced the fact that they had walked in from "Woodland," and would like some of the party to escort them back. One old bachelor, "Brother Shoestrings," said that he did not believe their story, but a handsome young widow kindly consented to go part of the way home with them, not feeling able to walk all the way to "Woodland." So they all started off together, but before they had gotten half way out of town the girls persuaded their companion to go into a drug store and have a glass of soda-water. While they were thus refreshing themselves, two of the party from "Woodland" walked into the store and said that they had come to take the fugitives home. On hearing this the handsome young widow told the girls "good-bye" and went on her way to "Thayer's Tavern," while the rest of the party set out for "Woodland." Before they had gone a great distance they were met by a vehicle sent to take them home, and into which they all climbed and were so driven back in fine style. It was after nine o'clock when they reached the house, but they prevented the well-deserved scolding by presenting their irate parents with some very nice pearhes and then hastily retiring to their respective rooms.

EVE AND VIRGIE.

Accident.

Great rains.

Esq. Hinebaugh visited our normal.

A good normal reported at Selbysport.

Josiah Beeghley is slowly recovering from a severe spell of sickness.

Many people have oats out in the rain in the sheaf.

Word has been received from Mr. George Kolb in San Francisco. He is well.

Miss Ella Butler, who is stopping at Dr. Glotfelty's, is instructing the Sunday School children in singing, two or three times a week, gratis.

Dr. Glotfelty's house is full of summer boarders.

The primary meeting was very slimly attended, owing to the tremendous down-pour of rain. The following were present: Jno. E. Gnagy, Jos. Beeghley, Jacob Beeghley, Jonas Feik, Geo. Beeghley, John Harmon, Leonard Shartzer and Dr. Glotfelty.

The roads around Accident have been much injured by the heavy rains.

A number of our young folks visited Bittinger Saturday, to take part in the pic-nic.

Over forty scholars are attending the Accident Normal. Accident furnishes a large quota.

What this community needs is good roads and a telegraph line to connect the two branches of the railroad.

Our mail facilities are now excellent. Daily mail to and from Oakland. Daily to and from Petersburg, and a daily to and from Grantsville.

A good road from Oakland to Grantsville via Accident, and a stage run over the road every day would be a great improvement.

A railroad along the Youghioghenny would bring it within speaking distance as it were.

The disease among domestic animals very prevalent here is aphthe. Epizootic sore mouth. The remedy is astringents—alum, tannin, &c., with plenty finely ground oats, rye, wheat, slippery-elm water, barley water, Finely ground grain, fed dry, is one of the best of remedies, being medicine and nutriment.

Pic-Nic.

At Mason's school house on Saturday, Sept, 1st, 1888, there will be a pic-nic and harvest-home, held by Cherry Creek school. Good speaking and music. Come one, come all, bring your baskets and spend the day. Proceeds for benefit of Sunday School.

GRANTSVILLE, Aug. 28th, 1888.

The Literary Society organized in the beginning of the term, held its regular meeting on Friday, 24th inst., discussing the question: "Is Capital Punishment right?" Affirmative, Messrs. Warnick and Stanton, and Miss Miller. Negative, Mr. Engle, Misses Getty and Augustine. The former winning the decision. Readings and recitations were rendered by Misses Keller, McKenzie, Frantz and Blocher; also by Messrs. Ryland, Custer, Stanton and Hamill.

On Friday, 31st inst., interesting exercises will conclude the school work of the present term, which will close a few weeks earlier, much to the regret of teacher and student. This is caused by repeated demands for Mr. Long's service on Sept. 3d, in Easton High School, which will require his immediate departure.

This is not caused by any circumstances or situation here; he is merely yielding to the request to work elsewhere, requiring the acceptance at once.

The students here are obedient, courteous, and energetic; the teacher, competent, willing and enthusiastic; both are mutually pleased with the work done, and both are sorry it may not longer be continued.

SONG OF THE SCYTHE.

Far up on the mountain-side,
Where swiftly, like phantoms, glide
The cloud-land shadows,
I hear a mower's scythe,
With a busy sound and blithe,
In the rocky meadows.

Hark!—on the breeze conveyed
The rhythmic rush of the blade,
By strong arms whirled!
It sings, in a murmurous tone,
Of work to be bravely done
In this busy world.

Sometimes, with a jangling tone,
The bright blade strikes a stone,
But seems to cry:
"'Tis naught! Let the worries pass.
There needs must be stones in the grass
For all who try."

Thus, wind-borne all day long,
You may hear the scythe's brave song
On the mountain farms.
But the mower little knows
Of the song that comes and goes
As he swings his arms.

"HELD UP."

An Englishman's Experiance in This Country.

From time to time there have appeared accounts in the American newspapers of the robbery of railway trains. These robberies have generally taken place in remote and outlying parts of the States, into which the railway system has but lately penetrated. For a train to be what the Americans called "held up," was, during the last year, rather a frequent occurrence, and the process of "holding up" was done in a manner so skillful as to be generally attended with success. There were cases reported in which the robbers got the worst of it, but they, too, often made good their escape, not only with their lives, but with considerable booty, leaving the train they had plundered to go on its way minus its mails and the passengers stripped of their money and valuables. Last November, on my way from San Francisco to New York, the train in which I crossed the Rocky Mountains fell into the hands of these marauding gentlemen; and as my experiences may be interesting I venture to give them here, though they may not be so startling as those of some other travelers who have fallen among thieves.

I left Salt Lake City on the forenoon of a beautiful day in the fall of the year, and after skirting the river "Jordan and the "Lake of Tiberias," names which the Mormons have transferred from Palestine to their own territory, the train began to enter a wild and rugged country, and to cross the great mountain rampart by which the plain of the Salt Lake is environed. All the afternoon we slowly ascended, and it was evening before we reached the Castle Gate, formed by two enormous steep rocky walls, between which the railway passes. There were a good many carriages in the train, and the "Pullman" in which I traveled had about twenty passengers. We were very sociable and time passed quickly. As soon as it was dark the berths on each side of the car were made up by the negro attendant, the heavy curtains drawn, and we all went to bed. I had been sleeping soundly when I was wakened at two in the morning by the train being brought suddenly to a stand-still. Being in the lower berth I had the advantage of having a window to look out of. I drew up the blind; a bright moon was shining and every object outside was perfectly clear and distinct. The place looked wild and lonely enough. Huge boulders of rock were strewn about, and the hillsides rose seamed and bare. As there was no railway station visible, and the train showed no sign of going on, I became convinced that something was wrong and wakened my traveling companion in the opposite berth. As he was partially dressed he said he would go and see "what was up," and made his way to the open platform of the car. On his appearing outside, he was asked by a man standing near the track, what he wanted. He replied that he merely wished to know what had stopped the train, when he received the not very reassuring answer, emphasized by a gun pointed at him. "Go back, you fool, or I'll drill a hole through you!"

The occupants of the car were now wide-awake, and popping their heads out from behind the curtains of their berths, discussed the situation in a lively manner. It was now evident that we were "held up," and the conversation turned on what was likely to be the upshot. I was particularly struck by the good humor with which every one seemed to regard the occurrence. It apparently was regarded by them as a very amusing experience, and by none more than by the ladies of our party, who joined freely in the conversation. No one could at all have imagined that they were expecting every moment a summons to march out in deshabille and take their stand in a row on the railway bank. Shouts of laughter abounded as one Yankee after another made dry observations as to what was likely to happen, and how the robbers would make hay of the beds while we stood shivering in the moonlight. Amid the merriment, however, there was evidently an effort by the passengers to make their money as safe as circumstances would permit. From all parts of the compartment there resounded the clink of coin. One person opposite me put his watch into a boot.

"Where have you put your money?" I heard a passenger in the next berth say to another.

"I have ripped up my mattress and put it there."

"Put it all in?"

"Yaas."

"Well then, I guess you had better take some out. Them boys knows you warn't traveling this line without a cent."

Then there was more clinking heard, as a reasonable sum was transferred from the mattress to the owner's purse. From an opposite berth I saw a lady emerge, robed in a dressing gown. She marched down the compartment to the door, where there stood a large tin cistern for holding iced water. The lid of this she opened and dropped in some hundred dollars. Replacing the lid she went back to her couch triumphantly.

"Guess they won't look there," she said to me as she passed by.

A long, thin man, who was by profession a "drummer," or commercial traveler, now said he would "pull on his pants and go out and prospect." In a few minutes he returned, and standing in the doorway, gave forth his information for the benefit of the company.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said: "the state of matters is this. They are now in the mail-car, trying to force the safe, and when they've done, we may expect the pleasure of their company here." So saying he made a graceful bow and retired.

The black attendant then locked the doors at each end of the car and went to bed.

"I'se hopes," he said, "they get enough to content them without a-coming here—plenty of shiners in dat safe."

Looking out of the window again I saw a curious sight. By the side of the truck stood the engine-driver and two others in a row with their hands up above their heads. They appeared like so many boys at school. I saw no one else, but a stout middle-aged man in a huge cowboy hat, with a gun in his hand. He looked like a well-to-do farmer. While I was watching, the engine-driver and his mates got up on the train, the engine gave a sharp snort, and to our great astonishment on we went. Sambo, the attendant, rushed out, and said we were fairly off. We passed the camp fire, beside which the robbers had waited for our arrival, and some logs of wood which had been laid across the track. The "drummer" now valiantly emerged on the platform armed with a shot-gun which he said was loaded with swan shot.

"I see one of them there behind that big stone," he cried; "guess I'll give him a stringing up."

The other passengers would not allow him to fire.

"They have got Lancaster rifles, you fool," said one roughly, and they'll go popping off sixteen shots apiece at the cars, and one of them may be 'll go through your darned old head." So the "drummer" restrained himself.

At the first station we stopped and the telegraph was set to work sending the news of what had happened up and down the line. We then got information as to what had really occurred. The engine-driver had seen a light set on the middle of the track. This was the usual signal to stop, and he pulled up. He found five men dressed like cowboys, and with blackened faces, waiting for him, who told him and his mates to come down and hold up their hands. Each of the robbers carried pistols and a rifle. Having placed a guard over the three men they proceeded to the mail car. This they left in a state of inexpressible confusion. Mail bags were ripped up, letters and newspapers lay scattered about. The bags, I think thirty-six in number, containing registered letters they took possession of. They then went to the car where the safe was kept, and ordered the man inside to open it. He had rolled all the heavy baggage against the door, and was slow in obeying their command. They told him to be quick or it would be worse for him. On entering, one of the robbers presented a pistol at his head, and told him to open the safe. He said he could not do that as it opened by an arrangement of letters composing a word. The word had been telegraphed on ahead, and he did not know it.

"I'll give you ten minutes," said the other, "and if you don't open it, guess you'll have to die.

When the ten minutes had elapsed he was going to execute his threat, but one of his comrades interfered, saying be believed the man was telling the truth. They then worked at the safe for some time, but after many attempts had to give up hopes of opening it. Afterwards they held a consultation as to whether they should go through the cars, but decided there were too many passengers for them to cope with. Going down to the track they removed two logs of wood they had placed across the rails.

"Get up," said the leader politely to the engine-driver. "Now you may go on—good-night!"

The whole booty was thus only the mail bags with the registered letters, the value of which it was impossible to tell. They did not even take the watches and money of the engine-driver and his comrades. The object of their expedition had evidently been the safe, which contained a considerable amount of gold.

In the smoking compartment of the train, I listened to a lively discussion as to the likelihood of the robbers being caught. The general opinion was that "the sheriff would nab them," though one "guessed they would skip out of that territory pretty quick."

"You see, stranger," said a fine open-faced man, from San Francisco, who from the number of wild adventures he related we called "the Scalper," "Uncle Sam don't care a dime for you and me being robbed, but its a cussedly different thing, touching the mails. You bet! they'll be nabbed." I asked him whether if they had come to our car, there would have been any resistance.

"Guess," he said, taking out of his pocket a neat little pistol, "there 'ud be some shootin' goin' on around. I wouldn't give them my money without pulling on them."

Then followed some California yarns, well worthy of Mayne Reid, how a train had lately been stopped at Kansas, how the guard shot four robbers, and the rest fled. The State gave him one thousand dollars and the company two thousand.

"He has now changed his trade," added the narrator.

"What for?" I inquired.

"O, he has been on the drunk ever since," was the reply, given as gravely as if "being on the drunk" was a well-known and honorable profession.

Then the "drummer" told how at Bucharist, he had waked one night, and found a man at work on the lock of his trunk, and getting out his pistol, had shot him through the arm and disabled him. And a ranchman, [illegible] West, from near Los Angeles, had a curious story, how the only time he was ever out without his pisto he had been robbed. After a series of similar tales, a grave man, who had been silently smoking his cigar, struck in.

"Well boys," he said, "I am glad them robbers got none of our plunder. but don't you go, any of you, and take the blood of a fellow-crittur. Its an awful thing to do sure-ly There was a friend of mine onst shot a man. He saw him put his hand behind his back, and thought he was going to draw, and pulled on him. The sheriff was after him, and he came up to my ranche, and I kept him dark, I did. But he was miserable. He said he could always hear the groans of the dying man. He saw him staring at him awful with all his eyes when he lay down in bed. He didn't live long after that. It's my ophion that business killed him. Don't you boys, go and take the life of a fellow-crittur if you can help it!"

So ended my adventure in the Rocky Mountains. I may add that I never heard while in America whether the robbers were captured. I do not know yet whether they are still at large. I saw, however, in a telegram lately that a train on the same line had been "held up," and "that the robbers had got off with a rich booty." Possibly they were my old friends of the Rockies still pursuing their calling.—J. Cameron Lees, D. D., in Good Words.

PURITAN WRITINGS.

What the Earliest American Literature Teaches Its Students.

The writings of all those early New-Englanders have an Elizabethan [illegible] ness of dictation which one tastes alike in the quaintness of Bradford's and Winslow's records of Plymouth, in the seriousness, sincerity and credulity of Higginson, and in the ribaldry of the ungodly and unruly Thomas Morton, of Merry Mount. One fond of tracing the origin of national traits and customs will find a pleasure in following to its far source in some of the New England and Virginia Englishmen of the seventeenth century the modern American fashion of booming a new country. The Rev. Francis Higginson does this in pleasing prose, and the good William Morcell in deadly verse, for Massachusetts Bay; John Smith blows the trumpet for Jamestown, and for all Virginia Colonel Norwood, in his voyages, sounds repeated blasts, while Master R. Rich praises the new land in as woful a ballad as any made to a mistress' eyebrow. Norwood has more than gleams of gayety, if one may not quite call it humor; his work has unquestionably literary quality, and we wish we could say as much for John Rolfe's wordy and scattering apology for marrying Pocahontas; but that has chiefly the quality of a very disagreeable self-righteousness.

The most valuable fact about the earliest American literature, which is not yet American of course, is that it so fully reflects the life of the time and place—the objective life of daring and adventure and hardship, and the subjective life tormented and maddened by abominable beliefs, with its struggles to escape from them. In Virginia these are not felt; there is a delightful freedom from them, but for this very reason the literature of that colony has a more superficial character; it lacks the depth as well as the gloom which characterizes the sermons and memoirs of New England.

Whether life more influences literatnre, or literature life, is a question we need not stop to dispute about here; they probably have a perfect balance of interaction at all times; but what one might certainly infer from this anthology of the Puritan literature is the Puritan life. If there were no other records of the state of the civilization which produced these writings, the general complexion of that life might be inferred here, and this gives an historical importance to the compilation which might be easily underrated. It would be a mistake to suppose that the Puritan life in New England was all psalms and sermons; enough is given to show that it had its reliefs, and to let the reader perceive that these were something of the nature and the general pleasurable effect of dancing in chains. —W. D. Howells, in Harper's Magazine.

A BOOMERANG BOYCOTT.

Some Racy Extracts From a Late Issue of the Arizona "Kicker."

THEY BOYCOTT US.—The fact that we have been running the Kicker pretty much as we pleased since the first number was issued has given mortal offense to certain people in this neighborhood. We have been kicked, licked, pounded, threatened, shot at and bluffed right along, and have grown fat on it.

We came to stay.

Fact is, we've got to. We haven't any thing to go on.

Having tried all other measures to make us let go, and having failed ingloriously in each instance, it was determined to boycott us in a social way. We have been chuck-a-luck with the very cream of society since our advent. In fact, we have been most of the cream.

It was decided a few days ago by a syndicate of the high-toned that we must be socially snubbed and crushed. Accordingly Mrs. Major Bazoo, of Grizzly Hights, announced a recherche affair and invited everybody in the set but us. It was given out that she feared our manners would disgrace the occasion, and if they didn't our clothes would.

We weren't saying a word. We saw the bluff and went one better. On the night of the party the sheriff made a haul of three high-toned prisoners at the house of Major Bazoo, while half a dozen others broke for the woods. We have got one great advantage over the other creams of society. We left the East by daylight and shook hands with the sheriff as we started. We are neither a bigamist, eloper, embezzler, horse thief, jailbird or gambler. We don't want to work this lever unless some one jumps on our collar. We have reluced tony society over half since wecame here by giving the sheriff pointers. We can run the other half out of town in a week. Mrs Major Bazoo hascalled to beg our pardon and express her deep disgust with herself. We have fergiven her, knowing it will not happen again. As for Judge Cahoots, who inspired the boycott and set the crushing machine at work, we bear him no animosity. We will simply remark that he is a bigamist, incendiary, embezzler, forger, perjurer and highway robber, and we have dispatched Pinkerton to come and get him.

WE SHAN'T WORRY.—Our amiable and gentlemanly sheriff entered our office day before yesterday in his usual urbane manner and announced that he must serve papers on us. It was a notice of a breach-of-promise suit against us by the widow Clixby, who alleges that we have been toying with her heart-strings, and that it will take $5,000 of our cash to settle her thoughts back in the old channel.

It is another move on the part of our enemies to down us.

We first met the widow Clixby twenty-eight days ago in Carter's grocery. She asked our opinion of herrings and we asked her's of soap. She invited us to call at the house and see some poetry she had written on the rise and fall of the mastodon. We complied. We called there three or four times afterwards, but only as a friend. On one occasion the widow showed us a clipping from an Eastern paper to the effect that it was better for man who had passed the age of twenty-three to marry a widow, if he was to marry, but we didn't bite.

We know our gait. If the widow Clixby can prove to the world that we have toyed with her affections we'll cheerfully go to jail. We are not on the toy. The widow will find us no jack-rabbit, and the enemies who have encouraged this new move may hear something drop before the trial is over.

A SAD MOOD.—Wednesday evening, as we put on our Mother Hubbard and sat down by the open window to get a breath of air before retiring, a sadness suddenly stole over us and in a few minutes we found tears in our eyes. The query came to us over and over and over again: "Is life worth the living?" and as we thought of the old homestead—the days of boyhood—the many graves—the changes of thirty years—the fountains of the deep were broken up and we wept.

Such moods do a man good. They bring him nearer Heaven's gate. We don't know whether they come from a disordered liver or the near presence of a guardian angel, but we always feel a heap better afterwards. We no longer feel a spirit of revenge. We have no greed. We feel charity for all.

And as the bright beams of the harvest moon steal into our office window and throw a flood of silver light upon the dead ads on the imposing stone—as the south wind comes sighing around the corner of Jackass Hill and whispers to us the story of household graves—as the whip-poor-will wakes from his sweet sleep in the rear of Stevens' disreputable dance house to call to us to press onward and upward and be not discouraged, we take down the office towel, wipe the falling tears away, and seek our couch with the determination to secure a pass from here to Omaha and return or make it so hot for the railroads that they will have to keep every tie wet all the year round. —Detroit Free Press.

—The Youth's Companion has much admiration for girls and women who learn to swim. It says: "Those of our readers who frequent the seaside resorts do not need to be told that many of the accomplished swimmers are young ladies. This is but natural. As their bones are generally lighter than those of men, and their flesh more buoyant, they have less difficulty to overcome in acquiring the art."

TEMPERANCE.

TEMPERANCE AND HEALTH.

The Experience of Daniel and His Three Companions — What Total Abstinence Did For Them.

"And at the end of ten days their countenances appeared fairer and fatter in flesh than all the children which did eat the portion of the King's meat. Thus Melzar took away the portion of their meat, and the wine that they should drink, and gave them pulse."—Daniel i, 15, 16.

When Nebuchadnezzar had carried the children of Judah captive to Babylon, he determined by a wise policy to incorporate them among his own people as far as practicable. So he gave orders to select the most promising youths, and have them trained and educated to become officers in his government. He desired them to have the best possible development, both physically and mentally; so he ordered them to have such food and drink as he himself used, and probably their teachers and studies were ordered with equal care. Many were selected, the most of whom appeared to have complied at once with the directions given. We hear nothing more of them. But Daniel and three other youths, his companions, chose a simple, nutritious diet, and no wine. He may have done this principally to avoid ceremonial defilement, but he evidently knew that this diet was also fitted to secure good physical and mental development. He therefore with confidence proposed the experiment of the pulse to eat and the water to drink. The pulse was peas and beans, with probably other seeds and grains. The result justified the choice. It was no more a miracle than we can accomplish in this day by similar means. For—

1. Temperance is principally a question of health. In its broadest sense it means keeping these bodies in their best condition for serving God, ourselves, and our fellow-men. Daniel wanted to keep his body in its best condition for such service. Its importance is implied in the first command given to the race in Paradise. It may be paraphrased thus: "Partake only of that which is good for you. That which is bad will sow in you the seeds of disease and death." This healthful temperance is, in its highest sense, that self-preservation which is the first law of nature.

2. Daniel's intelligent care for his health kept him from all danger of intemperance. Much oftener than we take into account, intemperance in all its degrees is due to the ignorance and indifference of the people about its effect upon their health. If they knew that the alcohol in these intoxicating drinks was a violent narcotic poison, and did them positive injury every time they took it, they would abstain far more than they do. It is this ignorance which prepares them to become the dupes of wine, the mocker.

3. It was by means of Daniel's Temperance that he kept and improved a healthful brain, and therefore his mental ability. He soon stood first among the princes and governors. We have also many examples in modern times where only the abstinent members of a college class came to honor. Of Daniel's classmates we hear again from only the three who were his messmates. That was when they withstood the command of the King to fall down and worship the idol which he had set up. Their faith delivered them from the fiery furnace, and covered them with lasting honor. Daniel's healthful body and brain not only served him well in early manhood, but carried him through a long and well-sustained career under four Kings. The wine he seems to have drank in his later years may not have been intoxicating wine.

4. Alcohol is a brain and nerve poison. Its action on the brain and nerves seems to be mainly through its greediness for water, which it sucks up from those moist and delicate tissues and disturbs their normal action, and thus the entire government of the body is deranged. This greediness of alcohol for water may be illustrated by the action of alcohol on the white of an egg, which it hardens by drawing from it a portion of its moisture. The action of alcohol on the nerves and brain may not proceed to the extent of hardening, but it destroys their normal action. Other derangements follow in diseases of the stomach, liver, kidneys, etc., till the drunkard becomes literally a mass of disease—physical, mental and spiritual.

5. The matter of a proper diet has much to do with both health and Temperance. Careful eating would often prevent the thirst that leads to drinking. The subject is well worthy of our careful attention, and is daily occupying more and more of the public consideration. It will more naturally follow the progress of intelligent abstinence from intoxicating drinks, for it is scarcely to be expected that people who do not know or care enough to prevent the downright poisoning of themselves with alcohol should exercise nice discrimination and self-denial about their foods.

PRACTICAL INFERENCES.

Self-interest should lead us to practice the strictest total abstinence. In Daniel's case it seems to have made all the difference between success and failure in life.

Permanent success in Temperance work would lead us to give freely the most thorough teaching of the principles of total abstinence. It is those people who most intelligently understand the action of alcohol that hate it the most intensely and devise the most effective measures against it.

If the conscientious convictions of the individual be secured he will help to make and enforce right laws; he will practice total abstinence both at home and abroad, both for his own sake and the sake of others.—Julia Coleman, in National Temperance Advocate.

GOOD AND FRUITFUL SEED.

The Temperance Work of an "Old-Fashioned," Thoughtful Little Girl, and the Reformation That Followed.

Gladys Hayden was a little English girl whom every body called very "old-fashioned," which was queer, because she was quite new, being only nine years old. Perhaps living and talking with her grandfather, the village curate, she had caught "old" fashions from him. One day they were sowing seed together in a little field by the pretty river, and he had preached her a nice sermon about great results from little deeds, like harvest from tiny seeds. It was not a dull sermon, for birds sang hymns before and after, and no church was ever so beautifully frescoed as was the spring sky with glorious clouds. Gladys remembered the talk, and used after that to think much of what was to grow out of little acts. Near her home was one of those magnificent great castles built hundreds of years ago, and which are now the wonder and pride of visitors and villagers. A noble family had lived there for centuries, its members once fierce warriors, but now peaceful, kindly people, interested in helping their neighbors and respected by them. Nothing delighted Gladys like a visit to the castle. The curate's housekeeper was a sister of a maid in the grand mansion, and several times, when the "family" were in London, the little girl had been all over the great dining-hall, hung with old banners over portraits of men in armor. Yes, and in corners were whole suits of armor that once were worn by fighters in historic battles. Then there were galleries full of wonderful curiosities, a chapel with dark oak carvings of queer beasts and birds and half-angelic, half-demoniac creatures, bedrooms with silk embroidery, and furniture that had been once in Queens' chambers. Outside were endless gardens with fountains, and parks where deer rested unmolested under huge, old trees. Oh! it was all, as Gladys thought, most beautiful.

The present owner of the castle was an earl who had a fine young son, not quite come of age, a great favorite with all the common people. Gladys knew the old earl by sight, but never had seen the young man, who was at Oxford studying. One day the housekeeper took her to the castle, and the two friends, the maid and Mrs. Phillips, gossiped and drank tea, and told their various aches and ails until Gladys grew pretty tired.

"You are such a quiet child, you may go look about the dining-hall, dear," said the maid at last; "only run right back to us if the earl should bring friends there. I fancy he is far away though.

Gladys gladly went to the great room and stood long at the window looking down at the river and into the tops of old cedar trees planted by a Crusader from slips brought from the Holy Land. All at once she saw what looked like a homely brass kettle, and going near, wondered what such an ugly thing was kept there for."

"Could you eat all the porridge that could hold, little one?" asked a very pleasant "boy," as she innocently thought him when she glanced up.

"I might in a year, perhaps, eat as much."

The young man, smiling, lifted her lightly into the huge vessel, where she nestled like a queer bird in a queerer nest.

"What is it here for?" she asked, when he took her out.

"It has stood here hundreds of years. They say the old earls were so much like giants they emptied it of beer at one draught. We don't believe that, do we? But every time an heir comes of age this pot is filled with wine and emptied—many times over, if there are many guests."

"And out on the lawn, and in the parks, casks and casks of beer," added Gladys, thoughtfully. "Grandpapa told me all about it, I remember." Then she gazed fixedly into the vast bowl, with her little hand on the rim, and the young man asked at last:

"What are you thinking about?"

"That I would not do it if I were the next heir."

"Did you ever see him?"

"No; but he is a very fine, brave, handsome young gentleman."

"Indeed! Well, what would you do?"

"I would scour it out," and she gave a funny little frown, "then I would fill it with sweets for all the children," then she laughed, "and out on the lawn I would have tea, and coffee, and gifts—flannel petticoats for old women." Here her auditor gave a shout; but she calmly went on. "Flannel is far warmer to last than beer, and Mrs. Phillips says, when men drink beer, babies and grandmothers lack the flannel. I would be a Temperance heir, and try to lessen drunkenness among my people, not make them drink more."

Greatly amused, the future earl put little Gladys through a long history of the village poor, the suffering, the sick and the care the curate took of his flock. Then he sent her away with a bright half-crown in her hand, and it was not until six months later that she knew the "pleasant boy" was the heir whose grand birthday festivities she attended.

There was wine and beer, but less of it than at any similar occasion for three hundred years, and before the curate died he saw a great reform in the town and county, which began at the castle. Gladys sowed seed that bore fruit.—Temperance Banner.

SABBATH-DAY READING.

A PRAYER OF FAITH.

Our hearts to Thee we raise,
O God, to whom be praise,
And endless love.
While we before Thee bow,
O hear and bless us now
From Heaven above.

See how we need Thy grace;
Turn not away Thy face;
But give us light.
Guide Thou our wand'ring feet
Near to Thy mercy-seat,
By Thy great might.

Cleanse Thou our mind and heart,
So shall we ne'er depart
From Him who died,
O keep us there, we pray,
And may we never stray
From His dear side.

Fill us with fervent hope,
While we to Thee look up,
O Lord of all!
May we rejoice in Thee,
From every sin made free,
No more to fall.

Keep us from day to day:
Be, Lord, our constant stay,
For we are Thine.
May we in Thee abide,
And then be satisfied
With peace divine.

AN IMPORTANT DIFFERENCE.

Living by Rule and Living by Principle—The Former Helps One to Do Right, the Latter to Be Right.

A rule is a measure or standard by which something is tested. The primary meaning of the word "rule" (regular) is a straight piece of wood by which the divergence of any thing to which it may be applied may be determined. Then, again, it means a maxim or precept, to which action or conduct is to be conformed. A principle (principium), on the other hand, is a beginning, a starting-point. As applied to any process, a principle denotes something which regulates it from the start. It is something initial, underlying, fundamental. As applied to conduct or character, a rule is something which seeks to conform it from without; a principle is something which tends to determine it from within. The rule is laid on with a view to straightening what is crooked, or tending to become so; a principle operates upon the wrong tendency at its seat and starting-point, with a view to overcoming the cause which produces the trouble. Rules of life may be likened to the splints and plaster forms which are put upon a broken arm to hold it to its place; principles are like the vital forces which are silently knitting together the fractured bones, healing the bruised flesh and restoring all the former vigor and freedom of the injured member. Good rules are like the thongs which held Ulysses firmly bound to the mast of his ship, and prevented him from landing at the Siren's isle; good principles are like the sweet music in Orpheus' soul, which enabled him to pass by disdaining the notes of the enchantresses. The pledges by which men bind themselves to abstinence from sinful indulgence are rules; the free resolves by which the soul chooses for itself a different range of pleasures which gradually work a revolution in the desires and tastes, so that the evil indulgence is no longer craved, are principles.

The difference between rules and principles is an important one. Rules are external; principles internal. Rules warn and restrain; principles guide and inspire. Rules tell you that you are wrong; principles enable you to get right. Rules help you to do right; principles help you to be right. Rules relate more to conduct; principles more to character.

There are two ways of trying to live a good life which correspond to these distinctions. Many excelent persons live chiefly by rule. They are regular, faithful, systematic and punctual in the performance of their duties. They look upon duty as what is due from them to their fellows and to society. They have certain obligations, and they will pay the debt. This is certainly excelent, and seems to be all that society can demand. And yet in such lives there is lacking a subtle and important thing. Right doing is too much a matter of debit and credit. The spirit of free helpfulness and spontaneous service has not transformed the life, and made its labor no mere doing of what is due, but a natural and almost inevitable expression of principles which are within it. Duty is done too much from the negative motive, as debts are often paid because the debtor dare not leave them longer unpaid. It is true that it is a thousand-fold better to do duty for any reason than not to do it at all, and that if we can not do it for the highest reason, we must do it nevertheless. But there is a better reason for doing it than simply because we shall be guilty and uncomfortable if we do not, and we shall only do duty in a way most helpful to others and to ourselves when we come upon the plane of that reason. The reason is that it is God's will, and that therefore our highest usefulness, influence, growth and happiness can only be attained by its performance. As sooon as we get this view of it, the light of new motives shines in upon it. The impulse to do it is no longer imparted from without, but springs from within. We do not longer goad ourselves to do it; it has grown easy and natural, because no longer done by rule, but from principle.

The whole plan of God in the education of the race illustrates these distinctions. The Old Testament is chiefly a dispensation of rules; the New Testament, of principles. It is in this fact that the fulfilment of the Old by the New is seen. It brought into clear view the principles of obedience and love, manifested them perfectly in a life, and enforced them by the highest motives. How natural is it, then, that he who takes up the life of right-doing from principle should, as Paul so often shows, be free from the law of the outward rules of life. No one can be free from moral rules and laws except by attaining and possessing corresponding moral principles; and when he has done this, he can not be "under law" any longer.

To possess good maxims and to obey good rules is worthy of much praise; but to live a life of free right-doing and right-thinking from impulses springing from right principles within is a far higher and nobler thing. Let none be contented short of this best attachment.—S. S. Times.

CHURCH STATISTICS.

Christianity Still Increasing Her Churches, Her Ministers and Her Communicants—Gains During the Past Year.

We publish this week a page of statistics of the Christian churches of the United States. It is the exhibit which we gave in May, 1887, revised according to the returns for the present year. It is less complete and less accurate than we could wish; but it is no fault of ours that some of the denominations have no official returns and that the estimates in some instances are open to the suspicion of being too liberal. Where official statistics are available we have used them; in other cases we have procured estimates from the most competent persons. In not a few instances the figures given are for former years. We are glad to say, however, that the churches are taking more trouble to secure correct yearly returns. The Disciples of Christ, for example, have begun the publication of a "Year Book;" so have the Christians and the Church of God. For some denominations, such as the branches of Plymouth Brethren, it is not possible even to get estimates; they refuse to give information. There are some thousands of Christians, therefore, who are not represented in our tables. We shall hope in time to be able to include them.

Our summary shows that there are 138,885 churches, 94,457 ministers and 19,790,323 members in this country. These totals, which are rather under than over the exact figures, are big with meaning. One hundred and thirty-nine thousand churches founded and maintained for the worship of God! More than ninety-four thousand ministers set apart for the declaration and exposition of the doctrines of Christianity! Almost twenty millions of souls baptized in the faith of Christianity! These are eloquent facts. They are witnesses of a living faith, an earnest spirit, and a consecrated life. For these facts tell of sacrifice and effort and costly endowment, which are not the symptoms of unbelief and godlessness. Unbelief has been in the world longer than Christianity; it came to this country more than a century ago; but it has no facts like these to speak for it.

The net gains for the year were 6,434 churches, 4,505 ministers and 774,861 communicants. These facts are eloquent, too. They show that the long-predicted decline of Christianity has not yet set in. Christianity is still increasing her churches, her ministers and her communicants. Every year many thousands of her communicants and hundreds of her ministers are swept away by death; but her numbers do not fail. She gathers in converts and educates ministers, and fills all the gaps and has a large excess. The excess this year is 4,500 ministers and 775,000 communicants. This means an addition to the force of the ministers of about 87, and to the number of communicants of 14,904 every week. More than seventeen new churches were organized every day of the year.

Every day saw 17 churches, 12 ministers and 2,129 communicants added to the forces of Christianity in the United States. This is the story which our statistics tell. Is it not a sublime story? Who can read it and lose heart and faith? Who can read it and not be glad and grateful?

And yet this is not the measure of the power and opportunity of the Church of Christ in this land. Leaving out the Roman Catholics, the net increase was 574,861 communicants. This is at the rate of 4.35 to each church, 6.6 to each minister and 1 to every 21 communicants. An average of 10 to each church would by no means be an extravagant expectation. That would give a net increase for the Protestant churches of 1,320,000. This is the number we might have had this year; it is the number we may have for the year to come.—N. Y. Independent.

FIFTY YEARS AGO.

Queen Victoria's Coronation in Westminster Abbey June 28, 1838.

Fifty years ago, on the 28th of June, 1838, the crown of these realms was placed upon the head of Queen Victoria. On the morning of that memorable day the sky was overcast for a time, and between seven and eight rain fell. The procession, which a vast multitude had gathered to see, would have been shorn of half its splendor and attraction if the weather were unfavorable. Happily the sky cleared and the sun shone forth brightly before the procession left Buckingham palace at ten o'clock. The beauty of the day was one of the charms of a spectacle which had not been equaled since the entry into London of the allied sovereigns in 1814. An incident occurred before the end of the ceremony at Westminster abbey which in the days of antiquity would have been hailed as a good omen and which, in fact, has proved emblematic of the brilliancy of a reign that is not only one of the longest but is one of the most memorable in our history. After the royal robe had been thrown over her Majesty's shoulders, after the orb had been placed in her hand and the ring upon her finger, after the Holy Bible had been presented to her and the Archbishop of Canterbury had pronounced a solemn blessing, then, to use the words of our reporter, "a gleam of sunshine which now broke through the great south rose window lighted right on her Majesty's crown, which sparkled like a galaxy and lent a still more dazzling brilliancy to the scene." There are men still living who were present not only at the coronation of the Queen but at that of her two predecessors on the throne. Yet the vast majority of the people have no acquaintance with such a ceremony now except at second hand, and it is our fervent hope that many years may elapse before another coronation takes place at Westminster Abbey. When the Queen was crowned there were some old men whose memories might stretch back to the time when George III. ascended the throne, yet there were many more to whom such an event as a coronation was not extraordinary and who had been present at that of George IV. seventeen years and that of William IV. seven years before. With the exception of the coronation of George III., no event of that kind was more noteworthy than that of her Majesty since the succession to the crown of these realms was settled by act of Parliament in the house of Brunswick.—London Times.

TOO MUCH WORK.

Why Americans Need the Gospel of Recreation Preached to Them.

If ever people needed to have preached to them a gospel of recreation, the Americans need it now. We work too hard, and too fast, and with too much friction, and, above all, too constantly. We are proud of our speed. We believe in "push" and "go." We are careless of the fact that haste makes waste, because we have plenty to waste. We do not understand nor practice, nor care any thing about economy, because we have not felt, as most peoples have, the need of economy. Our business man hurries from his home in the morning on the fastest train he can get, reads the newspaper all the way to his office, and grumbles at a delay of two minutes. He rushes through his business at a breakneck rate, snatches a lunch at midday, dictates letters to his type-writer, leaves himself just time enough to catch his train, and rushes home at the same pace. Once there, he enjoys himself by taking a ride behind the fastest horse he can afford to own. After dinner he plays a game of whist, or, as that is generally two slow for him, of poker, until after what ought to be his bed-time. If he lives in the city his evenings are spent at the club or the theater, or in the hotel corridors talking business. Rest he has none, except, perhaps, on Sunday, when he spends most of the morning looking through the papers, and most of the afternoon dozing, or perhaps taking another ride behind his trotters. Americans do everything fast, especially in New York. They take their drinks standing and at a gulp. They eat one meal a day in about the same fashion. They walk fast, talk fast, make and lose money fast, ride fast, sail fast, eat fast, drink fast, and if a way could be discovered of sleeping fast, they would do that.

After one gets into it there is a swing and a movement in all this that is fascinating. It is contagious, and we all catch it. There is the same sort of pleasure in doing business fast that there is in driving a fast horse or sailing a fast boat. That is one reason why New York is the most fascinating of American cities. After its "go" others seem a little tame. One becomes use to excitement, and wants to keep strung up to concert pitch all the time. Beyond doubt, too, there is something good and admirable in this rapidity. It enables us to accomplish marvels. We have come nearer than any other people to annihilating time and space.

But, after all, when one thinks it over calmly—if perchance he can ever find time to think calmly—is this hurry worth our while? Or, to put it from the American point of view, does it pay? The answer to that question depends upon the goal we have in view. Most men are making all this haste in order to get rich; but when they get rich do they "take things easy," and enjoy life? Possibly a few of them may, but the vast majority do not. When they get an income of $10,000 they want $20,000; when they have got that they want $40,000. Not one in a million of us ever gets rich enough, and the few who do leave off business generally find that they have lost, from disuse, whatever faculty of enjoyment they once had, aside from the hurry and push of the business world. The capacity for enjoyment has to be cultivated, like any other capacity; and it will not grow except by constant use.—Epoch.

DOZENS OF DEFINITIONS.

Read Them, and Then You Will Know What Constitutes a Lady.

To answer this qustion, we will again have recourse to the dictionaries. Johnson defines a lady as a woman of high rank; an illustrious or eminent woman; a woman—one of the fair sex; a mistress, importing power and dominion, as lady of the manor. This is broad enough, it would seem.

Stormonth gives these definitions: A woman of distinction or rank; the wife of a titled gentleman; the title of daughters of peers of the first three grades; a familiar term applied to the mistress or female head of a house of the better class; a woman in any station of life who is possessed of refined manners and kindness of heart, and generally whose character is adorned with those Christian and social virtues which men most love and esteem in women; a term of courtesy applied to any respectable female. The fifth of the above definitions is a remarkably good one, if it were not narrowed by the idea that Christianity alone comprised all the higher virtues.

Webster's definitions may be next considered. A lady, he tells us, is a woman who looks after the domestic affairs of a family; a mistress, the female head of a household; a woman of social distinction or position; the feminine corresponding to lord. In England, he further says, it is a title prefixed to the name of any woman whose husband is not of a lower rank than a knight, or whose father was a nobleman not lower than an earl; also, a woman of gentle and refined manners; the feminine corresponding to gentleman; a wife or spouse.

Worcester is more setisfactory, it would seem, in his definition, at least to the American notion of what constitutes a lady. Only one of his definitions need be quoted. He says a lady is a term of complaisance applied to almost any well-dressed woman, but appropriately to one of refined manners and education.—Boston Herald.

BUDDING STATESMEN.

The Little Fellows Who Wait on the Great Law-Makers of the Senate.

The Senate page corps numbers fifteen as bright and quick boys as can be found anywhere. They receive appointments on the recommendation of Senators, and come from all sections of the country. There is the elongated and dark-hued Southerner and the ruddy-cheeked and chunky Western boy, the quick Northerner and the spectacled New Englander. They are paid $75 a month each during the session of Congress, which generally lasts about eight months for the long and three months for the short session, and at the close of the latter it is customary to vote them an extra month's pay in order that they may return to their homes. In addition to their salary the pages make quite a goodly-sized sum by selling autograph albums containing the signatures of the Senators and prominent people whom they buttonhole for their autographs. Their period of butterfly life is rather short, however, as it generally does not extend beyond two Congresses, the age limit being between ten and sixteen. After they reach the age of sixteen they are compelled to leave.

The pages are very neat in their dress and pay great attention to style. They wear tunic coats and knee pants, generally of some dark material, and affect dark black silk stockings. Their work begins at nine a. m., when they assemble in the Senate chamber and get the desks of the Senators in order for the day, arranging the several bills, petitions, etc., on them, after which, unless there are errands to run, they can amuse themselves until twelve o'clock, when the Senate convenes, at which time they station themselves on either side of the President's platform. After the chaplain's prayer the work begins in earnest, and they are constantly on the run, answering the snap of the fingers of the Senators, carrying bills and papers to the President's desk and executing the multitudinous demands of the Senators.

The Senate usually is in session till four o'clock, when it goes into Executive session, releasing the pages from duty. As it is customary for the Senate to adjourn on Thursday evening until Monday morning, there is nothing for the pages to do in the interim, and they amuse themselves in various ways. Some are continually poring over novels of "The White Eagle, the Trapper" order, but the greater number are enthusiastic bicyclers, those who are not fortunate enough to own a wheel not begrudging paying sixty cents an hour for the rent of one, and many are the amusing squabbles among them as to how many minutes one has to ride it before another takes it, they having hired it on shares. It can not be denied, also, that some are confirmed gum chewers. The wide marble bannisters on either side of the stairs leading to the upper floors offer a great temptation to them to slide down them head first, rather than walk down, and the velocity with which they go (when a fall to the tassellated floor below means certain death) would terrify their mothers.

They are all young politicians, take a deep interest in the debates and are thoroughly posted on all topics that come before the Senate, and religiously defend the position and merits of their respective Senatorial favorites. It is no uncommon thing, after adjournment over some heated debate, for them to take sides and debate the arguments pro and con that they have heard. And they go at it with a vim, defying parliamentary law and grammar alike, and just as much in earnest as though they received $5,000 a year for it. But it is in their playroom, the awful mysteries of which they allow no other mortal eyes to penetrate, where the pages kick up high jinks. For good and sufficient reasons, apparent to the most casual observer, this room is located in a distant and secluded portion of the Capitol building, and there they shout, laugh and play to their heart's content. It is very seldom that quarrels among them ever result in blows, as it means a summons to appear before that awful tribunal, in the mind of a page, the sergeant-at-arms, to be followed by a suspension of two weeks or more with loss of pay.

The pages are under the charge and direction of old Captain Bassett, who has occupied the position, it is said, ever since the memory of man. He started in as a page himself and is now a hale, bald-headed and white-bearded old gentleman. His post of duty is to the left of the President and behind his youthful charges, where he can keep an eye on them. It would seem to take some ingenuity for a fourteen-year-old boy to dispose of $75 monthly, but some of them rise quite equal to the occasion. Others again have quite a good-sized bank account. Those who are so fortunate as to have relatives in Washington of course are well looked after, but those who have to trust to the tender mercies of the typical boarding-house keepers become after a time more or less reckless. Taken as a whole, they are a very gentlemanly, well-meaning lot of boys, and are said to be a great improvement on the force of former sessions. Senator German was once a page, and the story is that he frequently had his ears pulled by Captain Bassett on occasions when he lapsed from grace.—N. Y. Graphic.

—A most remarkable coincidence in connection with a Berks County (Penn.) family, Shilling by name, is that both parents were born on February 22, their marriage took place on February 22, and all of their six children (which includes two sets of twins) were born on February 22.

JOE BRANT'S WATCH.

The History of a Time-Piece Sent to America by George III.

An ancient silver time-piece, valuable for its historical associations no less than for its antiquity, is owned by Mr. Daniel Minthorn, of Watertown, N. Y. It weighs five and a quarter ounces, and is 250 years old; yet it keeps good time when wound, and has not been repaired since 1847. The watch is of the pattern known as the "British bulls-eye," and is an inch and a half thick. The face is of silver, roughly chased, and has a double row of figures, both the Arabic and Roman numerals appearing. It bears the mark of the maker, Thomas Linhard, of London, and the number 110. A search through ancient directories of the city of London, made by Mr. Minthorn at the Centennial Exposition, revealed the fact that this jeweler did business on Fleet street, between the years 1638 and 1658. The works look as substantial as though turned out yesterday. A tiny chain that winds around a drum takes the place of the spring in modern watches, and the cog-wheels and pivots are all large and heavy. The silver cases are very thick. The works can be removed from the case or box, and when inside are retained in place by a thick crystal that would flatten a bullet.

When Sir William Johnson owned Johnsontown, in Montgomery County, this State, and laid claim to considerable other land, he was a great favorite with King George III. As a mark of his favor the King sent this watch across the water to the nobleman. That was just before the war of the Revolution, and when Joseph Brant, the Indian leader, started on his death-spreading expedition up the Cherry valley, Sir William gave him the time-piece as an incentive to deeds of violence and pillage against the colonists. Thayendanega, as Brant was termed in the Indian tongue, promised to bring back forty white scalps in return for the gift. Settlers were massacred by the score, but Brant's expedition suffered too, and in one of the dashes the patriots made against his rear this watch was captured.

One of the few women who escaped the Indians was Mrs. Mabie, who fled by the light of the burning stacks and barns of her homestead to the woods. She had her two babies under her arms, and all hid under a huge root in the forest on the banks of Orris Kill Creek. While the Indians were near the heroic mother choked her infants' cries and was forced to throw water in their faces to revive them. After the savages had departed she walked eighteen miles to Schohaire with the babies. One of these was afterward the mother of Daniel Minthorn, the present owner of the watch. The time-piece fell into the hands of Evart Van Epps, a revolutionary officer, and by marriage into the Minthorn family, where it has remained ever since. Two years ago a big monument was unveiled at Brantford, Ont., to the memory of the old Thayendenega. The residents invited Mr. Minthorn to come with his watch and take part in the exercises and offered him $100. The old gentleman refused very indignantly, and wrote to the Monument Committee: "Do you suppose I would assist in a celebration to do honor to a man whose only good deed that I know of was his neglect to scalp my mother?"—*N. Another Tariff Talk.

New York Press.

Our tariff talk to-day is with Mr. Jas. W. Birkett of 68 Myrtle avenue and 67 Smith street, Brooklyn, who is the largest manufacturer of steam heating apparatus and steam fitters engineers' supplies in that city, and who has accumulated a competency with his own head and hands.

"Of course I shall vote for Harrison and Morton, not because I am a Republican, but for the reason that I am for Protection to home industries, and they stand on that platform, and so they will get my vote. If they stood on the platform made for Grover Cleveland I would cut my right hand off before it should deposit a ballot for them.

"I employ a great many men, and their wages average $21 a week. In Europe they could not earn half of it. I would be better off if the Democratic theory of taking the duty off raw material was put into practice, but I am not so selfish as to favor so pernicious a doctrine because it would benefit me and a few others. I take a higher view of it, and do not squint at it from that point alone. A great deal of arrant humbug finds its way into the columns of the Democratic newspapers to the effect that the manufacturers are the greatest beneficiaries from a protective tariff. Of course they are benefitted.

"If they were not they could not maintain the high rate of wages which our mechanics and working people receive. It is the latter who get the greater benefit from the tariff, not the manufacturers. Why, we pay on an average more than twice as much to our working people as they could get in any free trade country on the face of the earth. If protection doesn't enable us to do this what does? There is no comparison between the workingman's condition here and abroad,

"In Italy, Belgium and Austria forty or fifty cents a day is big pay for skilled mechanics, and thousands of them live, sleep and eat in the streets because they have no homes. I only wish every workingman could take a trip to Europe before he votes, to see for himself the degradation and misery of the working people there. He would come back for protection and for Harrison and Morton. My men are able to bring their families up in good style, and to educate their children. If they lived in Europe they could do neither. I tell you, the government of the United States is the greatest one in the world. Why? Because the working people, who are mainspring of any nation, are better housed, better fed, and better clothed and better educated than those of any other nation.

"Let Grover Cleveland and his free trade lieutenants from the South have their way and in ten years all this will be changed. Instead of building manufactories, churches and school houses, our ingenuity and purses will be taxed to the utmost to build almshouses fast enough to meet the demand for shelter from our workingmen and women whose occupations will be gone when the products of the pauper labor of European countries flood our market.

"'Oh, no,' says the Democrat, 'I am not a free trader, I am only for the reduction of war taxes.' What humbug. It is an insult to a man's intelligence. Reducing import duty will increase the revenue, because of the increased demand for the cheapess productions, and the only way the revenue from imports can be reduced is to take the duty off altogether.

"On many things we have a prohibitory duty now; reduce it and our workshops will be closed, but the revenue will be increased, not reduced. Competition here makes the price here as low as it can be for the welfare of the nation and the people. Take off the duties and swamp our manufacturers with pauper labor produced goods and financial ruin will stalk throughout the land. How careful the Democrats are not to hurt their fire eating brethren in Louisiana and the low lands where sugar and rice are grown, and yet these same fire eaters were absolute free traders when they had the power to be. One of the cardinal principles embodied in the Constitution of the late Confederate States was in these words, 'Nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of home industry.' And now these hypocrites say they do not mean free trade. I wish they could be induced to stop lying just long enough to tell me what in the name of heaven they do mean, if it is not free trade."

The London, England, Echo, speaking of the Democratic caucus of the House of Representatives, says:

Mr. Randall, if the American papers to hand this morning be correct, has left no stone unturned to defeat the free Trade policy. * * * * But the Democratic conference has resulted in his defeat, and it is now seen that the party has resolved to support the reduction of the tariff. This is good news for England.

A Remarkable Reception.

ATLANTA, GA., August 22.—Mr. McKinley's reception at the Georgia Chautauqua yesterday was something remarkable. Mr. McKinley was led to the stand by Henry W. Grady, and introduced in a speech of hearty welcome by Judge Howard Van Epps, of Atlanta, one of Georgia's most brilliant young men. A significant fact is, that Van Epps is a revenue tariff man, yet no welcome could have been heartier. In the course of his remarks Judge Van Epps said; "The truth is, the intelligent men of the South are growing impatient of the suggestion that it is political treason to listen to the other side of the argument of a great industrial question, and when in the Chicago convention this honorable gentleman (McKinley) put aside a tempting and brilliant chance to be President and ruler of 60,000,000 of people, saying in substance, 'I cannot accept the nomination without violating my own self-respect or abusing my sense of personal loyalty and friendship to Mr. Sherman,' he fixed public opinion as to his lofty character and shed a glory around American citizenship. Differ as we may on party questions, we share a national pride in him, which is irrespective of party affiliations, the same which we do not hesitate te avow of such men as Lincoln, Grant and Conkling and other kingly men who have illustrated the dignity and glory of American manhood." These and similar sentiments were loudly applauded. A more attentive audience was never gathered together, and judging by the applause the people were in sympathy with the speaker.

The Fatal Door.

The Chevalier Gerard De Kampsis was a very rich and a very proud man. Soon after the completion of his magnificent castle he wished to have a house-warming, and accordingly all his great neighbors were invited to a great feast. At the conclusion of a sumptuous repast his guests made speech after speech, in which the host was lauded to the skies, and told that he was the most fortunate man alive. As the chevalier loved flattery, we can imagine how proud and delighted he was.

One among the guests, however, said nothing for a time. When each man had made his speech, he uttered the following singular observation upon the happiness of the host:

"Sir Knight, in order that your felicity should be complete, you require but one thing; but this is a very important item."

"And what thing is that?" demanded the knight, opening wide his eyes.

"One of your doors must be walled up," replied his guest.

At this strange rejoinder several of the guests began to laugh, and Gerard himself looked as much as to say "This man has gone mad." Pondering, however, to have the clue to the enigma, he continued:

'But which door do you mean?"

"I mean that through which you will one day be carried to your grave," replied the other.

Mrs. Dart's Triplets.

President Cleveland's Prize for the three best babies at the Aurora County Fair, in 1887, was given to these triplets, Mollie, Ida, and Ray, children of Mrs. A. K. Dart, Hamburgh, N. Y. She writes: "Last August the little ones became very sick, and as I could get no other food that would agree with them, I commenced the use of Lactated Food. It helped them immediately, and they were soon as well as ever, and I consider it very largely due to the Food that they are now so well." Lactated Food is the best Food for bottle-fed babies. It keeps them well, and is better than medicine when they are sick. Three sizes: 25c., 50c., $1.00. At druggists. Cabinet photo. of these triplets sent free to the mother of any baby born this year.

"I have used Ayer's Pills for the past thirty years and consider them an invaluable family medicine. I know of no better remedy for liver troubles, and have always found them a prompt cure for dyspepsia."—James Quinn, 90 Middle st., Hartford, Conn.

"Having been troubled with costiveness, which seems inevitable with persons of sedentary habits, I have tried Ayer's Pills, hoping for relief. I am glad to say that they have served me better than any other medicine. I arrive at this conclusion only after a faithful trial of their merits."—Samuel T. Jones, Oak st., Boston, Mass.

OUR CALIFORNIA LETTER.

OAKLAND, CAL., Aug. 22d, 1888.

As my friends will see from the above, I am still in "Oakland," though a very different Oakland from the one you all know so well. But it seems strange that we should cross the continent and settle down in a place with the same name as the one we came from. In name only are the two places alike, and towards the close of my letter I will give you a faint idea of what this Oakland is.

After leaving Oakland our first resting place was Chicago, where we spent two days with a friend, and they were days full of pleasure. Chicago is a world's wonder, and it would take weeks to see its many attractions. The buildings are good, and no where in the East, even New York, can such blocks of fine buildings be found, and the great wholesale houses look like solid fortresses. The streets are crowded day and night with throngs of people, and the roar and din is deafening. Chicago has nice fine depots than any other city in the Union. They are scattered all over the city, and it must have taken millions to have built them. The B. & O. has a wretched old brick shed which is a disgrace to the city and the company, which answers the purpose of a depot. But so far the B. & O. have not been granted any privileges by the city, and doubtless when they are, they will build something to be proud of. To-day Chicago is far ahead of New York in fine buildings, cable cars and fine streets, and she has a park that is the finest I have ever seen. In this park you find a very fine collection of animals. The view from the park is lovely, and thousands of people wend their way through it, enjoying its beauty.

From Chicago we went to Kansas City, where we had four hours. It was on Sunday morning, and nearly every business place was closed. We saw what we could of the city, and while rough-looking and built on bluffs, it is a wonderful place. This was our last stop until we reached Los Angeles and Pasadena. The journey from Chicago to Kansas City was through a lovely farming country, and the corn-fields stretched away for miles and miles, and we passed through lovely towns, and past beautiful homes; in fact such a country as California with all its boasted beauty, cannot compare with. For hundreds of miles west of Kansas City we saw nothing but corn-fields; fields containing from one hundred to five thousand acres, and covered with corn from four to six feet high, and remember that was about the 18th of July. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Missouri, are all fine states, but Eastern Kansas beats them all. The great prairies (which are now corn-fields) sweep away for hundred of miles, and are as level as a garden. Houses are seen everywhere, and towns and hamlets every few miles. Everything speaks of prosperity and happiness, and here people live, don't simply exist.

Leaving Kansas City at noon on Sunday, we settled down for a three and a-half days' ride, having two large baskets full of lunch, and some books and papers, and thus prepared, we were ready to enjoy the changing scene as we sat in a splendid Pulman Palace car, and spun away toward the sitting sun and the "Golden State." Through Kansas we saw vast field stretching away in every direction, covered with corn, and great pasture fields where thousands and tens of thousands of cattle were feeding. The change is quite marked in crossing out of Kansas into Colorado. The Southeastern corner of Colorado through which we passed, being very much like the "Glades" country of Maryland, only as we approached the Rockies the great level glades and timber-covered lands stretched away for miles and miles, and great mountains rose up thousands of feet, many of the peaks being 13,000 to 14,000 feet high. We saw gleams of the "eternal snow" on some of them glittering in the bright July sun. All through Colorado we saw great herds of fine cattle and horses, and "cow-boys" by the hundreds; and we saw them do some fine shooting. After crossing the Rockies we went "down grade" and passed through a wild country of level lands covered with great hills and cliffs of rocks, and cut through with great canons (pronounced "canyon") some two thousand feet deep. The cause of these rents in the earth is a mystery, and they look as though at some time the earth had opened and remained so. New Mexico is full of great mountains and piles on piles of rock, and every mile revealed new wonders. Here we saw Indians and Mexicans in great numbers, and bought some small articles from them. We saw plenty of Mexican Towns, the houses being built of "adob" bricks (sun-dried mud bricks). New Mexico would be a charming place for homes if rid of Indians and Mexicans. The green valleys at the foot of the great mountains are lovely, and stereams of pure water are seen every where, and beautiful flowers grow in every direction. From New Mexico we passed into Arizona, the land of sand, rocks, extinct volcanoes and lava. Hour after hour we passed through great desserts of sand, without a green leaf or a drop of water, while the lava beds extended for miles, and far away we could see great ranges of mountains, which are rich in gold and silver, and where the great mining camps are scattered, and to which provisions are hauled by wagon for one and two hundred miles.

The boundary line between Arizona and California is the great Colorado river, and early Wednesday morning we crossed it and were in the "land of promise"—Southern California. For some distance it was dry and arid like Arizona, but soon we came to green fields and fruit orchards and vineyards. Here we had our first California fruits, and they were fine and refreshing after our long journey over the desert. We reached Pasadena at 9 P. M. and were met by Mr. and Mrs. Gearhart, who were expecting us, and with whom we spent two days at their lovely home, surrounded with all the comforts of an Eastern home (they are from Indiana) and the tropical luxuries of Southern California. Here we found Miss Lillie Brown had left that morning for San Francisco, to attend the great State convention of teachers, and to meet us there. The two days there we spent very pleasantly, and enjoyed the good milk and butter and oranges of our kind friends. We visited Los Angeles and on Friday night we started for San Francisco. The ride from Los Angeles to San Francisco was the worst part of our entire journey, as the heat and dust was terrible. We had a washout and did not reach San Francisco until 12 o'clock Saturday night. We spent Sunday and Monday here and on Tuesday moved over to Oakland.

San Francisco is a great city, and being the great port of the Western coast, and furnishing supplies for the far Western and Northern states, it has an immense business. The stores are packed with the greatest quanities and varieties of goods, and the window displayes are very fine. Market street is the great thoroughfare and has four cable and car lines. As many as forty cable and horse cars can be counted at one time from any of the corners. All other streets run into Market, and the ferries are at its foot. In this city you see people from every part of the world, and its port is full of ships from every quarter of the globe. Twenty to twenty-five vessels arrive every day. The bay between San Francisco and Oakland is about five miles wide, and ferry steamers cross every fifteen minutes. About 20,000 people cross each and every 24 hours, and freight by the tons.

Oakland is a lovely city of 50,000, extending along the bay for some three miles. Here are lovely homes and green parks, while the streets are full of well dressed people and splendid carriages. Broadway, its great business street, is full of fine stores and you can buy anything you mention. Nearly all the business men are wealthy and most of them are Jews. Here you will find a fruit store doing a business of eight thousand dollars a day, and crowded for more room. Rents are very high. Stores one hundred feet deep rent at from three to eight hundred dollars per month, while small candy and tobacco stands rent at from fifty to two hundred per month. Houses two miles out, with eight or ten rooms, rent at forty to fifty dollars per month, while cottages of four and five rooms are from twenty to forty per month. Living is high, as meats and butter and milk cost double what they do in the East. But fruits and vegetables are very cheap, and no fires are required. A family need not burn more than three quarters to one ton of coal in a year, and many only use oil stoves.

The climate of Oakland is not what Californians say it is, but it is far better than that of San Francisco. Here the mornings are damp and cool, and the days bright and sunny, with cool nights. In San Francisco the trade winds blow constantly and are bitter cold, while the streets are full of clouds of sand and dust, and great banks of fog blow in from the Pacific constantly. San Francisco requires heavy flannels and overcoats all the time. Sometimes they have a bright sunny day, but not often. This is the reason why some fifteen thousand people live in Oakland, who do business in San Francisco.

There are many beautiful places near San Francisco. The Cliff house and seal rocks, the Golden Gate, the Golden Gate Park, &c., &c., are full of interest to strangers.

In the "Golden Gate Park" there is a beautiful monument to "Francis Key," the author of the "Star spangled banner." The monument is very fine, and Key is sitting under a canopy, with a roll of paper in his hand, looking away towards the Golden Gate. The whole monument stands about 25 feet high, and on the base a figure of Liberty is seated extending a crown. On the sides of the pedestal, sunk in the granite, in gold letters are the lines of his immortal poem. Thus, three thousand miles away from the scene of its composition, the Golden State has paid him the tribute he so well deserved. The work is very fine, and the grand and noble face is finely cut. Our Baltimore friends would be proud of it as they are of his memory.

The great wharves, piled up with shipping of all kinds, and the loading and unloading of ships, the rush and roar of trade, the din of factories all are matters of interest, and tell the story of this great exporting and importing city. China town is a strange place, and is well worth a visit. Here are 60,000 Chinamen engaged in trade of all kinds, and in all kinds of wrong doing. There are many churches and some public buildings. The city is full of strangers and adventurers and fortune seekers. But fortunes cannot be made here as easily as formerly. The people here are too fast for Eastern people, and everything is done with a rush. I saw seventy-four thousand dollars worth of building lots in San Francisco, sold in less than one hour and saw the purchasers pay cash down. This is an every day occurrence. Sales of all kinds are made in the shortest possible time. Even in the stores it is the same, and people buy in half the time they do in the East.

Everything in business lines is done on a large scale, and all lines are over done. So many are now engaged in business that I wonder how they all exist. New men have no chance here, as there are thousands ahead of them. Business men even go so far as to say, "We don't want Eastern men; we have enough of our own, and Eastern people are too slow for us." Even working men have a hard time to get employment, and hundreds of the best workmen can't get a days work. The great trouble with California is every device possible has been used to induce people to come here from the East and spend their money, and the result is, there is nothing for them, and the thing has been over done. For the benefit of some of my good old Garrett county friends I would say, do not believe any of the printed matter you may receive, and be satisfied with dear old Maryland. If you have plenty of money, you can do well here, but without money, you will not succeed. It takes a fortune to buy a farm. No good land can be bought near any town, unimproved, for less than $500 to $1000 per acre, and when you go back from the railroads twenty or thirty miles, land will cost from $75 to $100. True, big crops are raised, but it takes plenty of money to do it. Men in the business tell me the fruit business does not pay as the reports state. Only some places and some farms and fruit growers make much out of their lands. Any man who can come here with from $5,000 to $10,000 dollars can make money farming, but with less, I don't think he could. So many things are different from what we had in Garrett, that our good old Garrett farmers would be disappointed.

This is a grand country and a fine climate, but I don't think (unless on account of health) that it would be worth the trouble, expense and loss, to sell a good home in the East to come here. So if any one wants to come, come alone first and look around and then decide. Still I like the State very much, and if I succeed, I expect to be very happy.

THE FRIEND OF AGES AGO.

"Should auld acquaintance be forgot?"
—Yes, if you'd just as lief as not.
JOHN PAUL.

There are several things that trouble one's age,
And work for a man much woe,
Such as gout—and doubt—debts that will run,
And rhyme that will not flow.
But when all has been said, do we not most dread,
Of the many bores that we know,
That ubiquitious ban, the woman or man,
Who knew one "ages ago?"

In youth—you were young; and foolish perhaps;
You flirted with high and with low,
Had one love on the hill and one down by the mill—
Yet never were wicked, ah, no!
And this friend knew you in a far-away way,
In a way that was only so, so—
Just enough to give hue to the cry about you:
"O, I knew him ages ago!"

You are married now and quite circumspect,
Your pace, like your speech, is slow;
You tell in a bank, keep silent in church—
Are one it is proper to know;
But this vigilant friend will never consent
That your virtues unchallenged shall go—
Though she never demurs, but only avers
That she knew you "ages ago."

And sure I am that if ever I win
To the place where I hope to go—
To sit among saints—perhaps the chief—
In raiment as white as snow,
Before me and busy among the blest—
Perhaps in the self-same row—
I shall find my ban, this woman or man,
Who knew me "ages ago."

And shall hear the voice I so oft have heard—
Do you think it is sweet and low?—
As it whispers still with accent shrill
The refrain that so well I know:
"O, you needn't be setting much store by him,
This new angel's not much of a show,
He may fool some saint who isn't acquaint—
But I knew him "ages ago!"

BOB AND ALICE.

The Story of Mr. Heath's Last Ten Thousand Pounds.

PART I.

On a wet, gloomy afternoon in the April of 187- Mr. James Heath sat in a house in Adam street, Strand, and in the curiously furnished apartment which he called his office. The very dirty window curtains of the room were of the richest silk. The costly Turkey carpet was covered with dust and littered with bundles of old law papers and newspapers, besides letters and other documents which, having been torn up, had evidently lain on the floor untouched for weeks or months. On the walls of the room were hung a number of valuable oil paintings, water colors and engravings. Madonnas and Holy Families of the early Spanish and Italian schools, pets of the ballet and the prize ring, Dutch boors, landscapes, portraits and racing scenes—mingled as they were without the least regard to style or subject, the general effect was altogether novel and surprising. About the chamber were a numbbr of chairs and couches, mostly of antique patterns, but all of them made of the most costly materials, and covered, like the carpet, with dust. In the corners of the room were piles of well-bound volumes, and two massive side-boards—one of oak, the other of ebony—were piled with miscellaneous heaps of books, glasses and silver plate. Every thing about the chamber, in short, was dirty, costly and incongruous.

Finally, muffled up in a thick overcoat, and with his back to the fire-place, in which there was no fire, sat Mr. Heath. He was a rather stout man of about sixty, with keen, gray eyes, white hair and a very rubicund complexion. On the table before him stood among a number of papers, a bottle of brandy and a tumbler, and he was engaged in reading a long letter, which was written in a rather sprawling, boyish hand.

"Dear Sir," the letter ran, "I must have £500 by Monday, and I want at least £500 besides. This, with what I owe you at present, will make £4,000. I propose, in consideration of that £1,000 which I now ask you to advance, to assign to you the whole of my life interest in the £15,000 3 per cent. consols, together with the whole interest under the policy of assurance for the £3,000. The premiums on the policy only amount to £200 per annum, so that the £450 odd which accrues from the consols will leave a balance of about 250 per cent. interest on the £4,000 until the policy falls in. In other words, for £4,000 you get an absolute reversion in £10,000, together with £250 a year until the reversion is realized. I am aware that I could do better than this, but I want the money at once and I am ready to submit to the sacrifice for immediate payment. I shall call on you to-morrow afternoon at four o'clock, when I hope you will let me have a check. Yours, faithfully,

"ROBERT OSWALD."

Mr. Heath read the letter very carefully through two or three times, after which he laid it on the table and poured out nearly half a tumbler of brandy. Having mixed this with a very little water, he drank it off and leaned back in his chair, while he indulged in a soliloquy which he muttered half aloud.

"Yes," he said, "the terms are good enough. The young fool is in consumption already, though he's barely twenty-three, and this season will kill him. Chapman says his right lung is nearly gone—lucky I got him to insure for the big sum at once. Wants the money, I suppose, to meet his losses on the City and Suburban. What's he going to do, I wonder, when he has parted with his interest in the £15,000? Fall back on his mother, I suppose. She's supposed to be wealthy, but her money is all in American stocks, they say, and if report is true she knows how to keep it. The widow of a Scotchman, who made a fortune in America, they came back to England about five years since to get into society and put young hopeful through Oxford. The father died three years ago, and the mother has been leading a rather retired life since, so they say. But, nonsense, what has all this to do with me? Young Mr. Oswald, who has got himself into consumption through dissipation, is practically offering me £10,000 for a further advance of £1,000. Even if I had to wait a few years it's good enough. But he hasn't twelve months' life in him. Three months more, at the rate he is going at present, ought to finish him! And then!"

Mr. Heath poured some more brandy into his tumbler. Having drunk it, he continued almost aloud, and in an excited manner:

"Then I have made the £100,000 which it has been the ambition of my life to be worth. This is the last ten thousand. With this I shall be worth almost exactly one hundred and two thousand pounds in hard cash, besides the good will of this accursed business, and all the things connected with it, which I shall dispose of at once. Why, I ought to have nearly one hundred and ten thousand pounds; but never mind, once I have a hundred thousand pounds in hard cash, I shall give up. To that I have made up my mind. And then? Well, I shall go on the continent for a time. I'd be pretty well forgotten in the course of two or three years, and my name is not in particularly good odor just now—hasn't been for years past. Never mind that—when a man has four or five thousand a year, people are not too particular about his antecedents. I may take a place a little way out of London—be a sort of county magnate for a bit—and work my way into a decent club. Let them say what they like behind my back, they'd be bound to be civil to my face, and that's all that any one need care. Half the peers in England would go crazy if they only knew what their servants were saying about them. Fools, we're all, more or less, tarred with the same brush, thinking vermin as we are, if this new theory of evolution, or whatever it's called be true. No, if I once get foot into a good club, they could not get it out again, if I can only afford to act respectably. Let them whisper what they like behind my back, all that I have to deal with is what is said or done before my face, and the hounds would be silent, for they can prove nothing. If the brutes have to lick me what do I care if they would like to bite. 'Heavens, what a contemptible thing is human nature!' the great Napoleon used to say when he was a young man starving in Paris. Contemptible is not the word. Worthless—indifferent—unworthy of even contempt—poor wretched puppets. You band together, and club your wretched selfishness into what you call respectability. Respect? Why you will have more real respect for me, who'll force my way, and walk alone among you, than you have for the sleekest creature of your pack. Yes, 'Lions walk alone, jackals herd together,' as Pitt used to say, and one can play the Pitt or the Napoleon in private, as well as in public life, if need be. Yes, I have only to wait now till Mr. Oswald smashes up the little that's left of his constitution. Not many months at the furthest. Strange that the last 10,000 should come altogether in this way; I might have been three or four years getting it together. Perhaps longer. Who can tell? We make more bad debts than people think, and, like the snail crawling up the post, I might, now and then, have slipped down at night twice as far as I had crawled during the day.

"But here, the whole thing is done. The last ten thousand made, as the saying is by a stroke of my pen. And yet it's curious how I have had a suspicion from the first moment I set eyes upon this brat that he'd be at once my making and my ruin. Tush! such nonsense; the thing is perfectly legal, and the money is perfectly safe. Even if I lost it, I'd be very far from ruined; but it is quite safe. So, Mr. Oswald, you shall have your thousand pounds, more especially as you are pretty certain to kill yourself with it. Still I have a strange liking for the lad. He has good qualities with all his folly. But oh, humbug! what have I to do with these feelings! If I had any one to leave my money to—a child of my own to inherit my wealth—I might wish to leave it a little cleaner than it is. Yes, it's hard to think that the riches for which I have toiled will go to people who curse my name—if I don't leave them to the nation, or turn them into cash and fling it into the sea before I die. Come in!"

The last two words were in answer to a knock at the door.

"Mr. Oswald, sir," said a boy who acted as a sort of clerk to Mr. Heath.

"Show him in," said the latter as he resumed his seat at the table.

A tall, handsome, but very delicate young man entered the room.

"Well, young sir, what can I do for you?" said Heath in a gruff voice, which was intended to be pleasant and assuring.

One of Mr. Heath's peculiarities was that he seemed to take a delight in making his clients state their business as often as possible, however well he might be acquainted with it.

"You can offer me a chair if you want to be civil, and a glass of brandy if you're inclined to be friendly," replied Oswald, in a languidly familiar manner, which just bordered on being contemptuous.

"O, please be seated, my dear sir, if you insist on ceremony," said Heath, pushing the bottle and a glass toward his visitor as he spoke. "And now, besides offering you a chair and a little brandy, what else can I do for you?"

"Well, confound it! you know what I have come about. You have had my letter. What's the use of asking such a question?" was the impatient rejoinder.

"Yes, I have had your letter, but I don't like the business. I tell you frankly, I don't like to see a young man ruining himself as you are doing——"

"O, curse it all! I have not come here to be lectured," interrupted Oswald, angrily. "Will you do the thing or not? This is Thursday. I must have the money by Saturday night."

"I would have to give notice to the trustees of this fresh charge, and there is barely time to get the thing through. I would rather you took the matter somewhere else," replied Heath, dubiously.

"But is impossible, and I must meet my engagements on Monday," was the answer.

The result of some further conversation was that Mr. Heath, with a great show of reluctance, suffered himself to be persuaded to have every thing ready to make this further and final advance on Saturday.

"You will have twenty pounds in gold, eight ten-pound notes, and the remaining nine hundred pounds 'short,'" said Oswald as he was leaving the room.

"Yes, I hope you will take care of it," replied Heath.

"I shall win twenty thousand over the Guineas. Good evening," was the answer, and Mr. Oswald took his departure.

On Saturday Oswald duly received the £1,000 after he had executed a deed, by which he assigned the policy of assurance and his life interest in the £15,000 consols to Mr. Heath. According to the will of the late Mr. Oswald, the £15,000 was, if Robert Oswald died without issue, to be paid to a distant relative who lived in America.

Mrs. Oswald, I may add, derived her income from certain investments in American railway stocks. She was supposed to be very well off, but it was a curious thing that, though she went a good deal into society, nobody seemed to know much about either her or her late husband. They had come from America about five years before and taken a house in Porchester Terrace, Bayswater.

The late Mr. Oswald brought very satisfactory references from Chicago, kept a very good balance at his bank, and entertained, as did Mrs. Oswald, in a very hospitable manner. This, however, was really all that was known about them. As to their son, Robert, he had unluckily taken to betting, and got into the clutches of Mr. Heath, with what result, so far, we have seen above.

It is not necessary to say more than that Robert Oswald lost his money, and brought himself to his death-bed during the next two months. As Mr. Heath knew, he was in consumption when he sold his annunity, and the effect of his losses and constant dissipation precipitated the collapse of his system. "When sorrows come, they come not single spies but in battalions." On the morning after the race for the "Two Thousand Guineas," when Robert was left utterly penniless, and in debt to a number of bookmakers, Mrs. Oswald received a letter from her stock broker, saying that he would like to see her at her earliest convenience. Accordingly she went at once to the City, where she learned that the two American railways in which nearly all her money was invested had ceased to pay dividends. That, in short, the shares were almost unsalable, as it was highly probable that the concerns would be sold under foreclosure of mortgages. Mrs. Oswald did all she could under the circumstances. She gave up her house in Portchester Terrace, and took lodgings in St. Paul's road, Camden Town, where she devoted herself to the task of nursing her son, who was now fast sinking in consumption.

PART II.

In the second week of the following June, Mr. Heath, who had a small house in Notting Hill, was sitting in his parlor at a little after eight o'clock in the evening, when the servant came in to say that a Mr. Bailey wished to see him.

"Show him in at once," said Heath, who rose from his seat and went to the door to meet him.

A shabbily-dressed little man, who looked something like a lawyer's clerk out of employment, came into the room.

"Well," said Heath, in his usual gruff way, when he had closed the door, which he did very carefully as if he were afraid that somebody might be listening outside,

"Mr. Oswald's dead, sir. Died at five o'clock this evening. I only heard of it within the last hour, and I came on at once to tell you."

For a moment there was silence, during which the little man stood twirling his hat in his hands.

At last Heath said: "Are you quite certain of this?"

"Quite certain, sir," was the answer. "I have it from the servant in the house. I had been expecting the news all day and directly Mrs. Wilmot told me I thought I'd make assurance doubly sure by seeing the servant myself. As I told you, I knew her before she went to live in St. Paul's road. I told you how I heard from Mrs. Wilmot every thing that went on in the house."

"Well, well, that will do. Here is a sovereign for your trouble in coming here. Look into my office next week, and I shall pay you what we have arranged, when I have the formal proofs of his death. Good-night."

"Good-night, sir, thank you," said Bailey, as he left the room.

Bailey was a nondescript character who was occasionally employed by Heath, sometimes as a broker, sometimes as a private detective. In the present instance, by virtue of his having some relatives living in St. Paul's road, he had been engaged to bring Mr. Heath the earliest intelligence of Robert Oswald's death. When he had gone Heath walked up and down the room for some minutes in silence. At length he muttered to himself:

"One hundred and two thousand pounds in hard cash made at last! I shall sell every thing I own within a fortnight's time—furniture, bills, pictures, all. They will fetch another six thousand; but, whatever they bring, they shall be sold at once. I am determined to enjoy my wealth while I have time, and to do that I must cut the life I have been leading at once. Yes, my 'pile' is made. I have at last what, years ago, I said I would make, and I shall be out of England this day fortnight. What may I not do yet with over a hundred thousand pounds and the brains and knowledge which I possess! Good heavens, how suddenly the last ten thousand has come! What a lucky chance it was that threw the young fool into my clutches! I managed him properly, there's no doubt. But yet it was a lucky chance that brought him to me. Still it's strange the presentiment I have always had about him. O, bother such nonsense! What have I to do with presentiments! I shall be believing in ghosts and hobgoblins next! Yet I seem to be sorry in a sort of glad, and there is that fear of some impending evil which I seemed to have every time I saw him. What on earth can this be!"

The last question was caused by a sharp knock and ring at the hall door. In a few seconds the servant came in with a telegram. Mr. Heath looked at the envelope nervously before he opened it. At last he took out the telegram, which he read two or three times over, as if he doubted the evidence of his eyesight. Then he put the telegram in his pocket, whispering to himself in a trembling voice as he did so:

"What can it be! What can it be!"

The telegram which evidently caused him so much uneasiness was as follows:

"Mrs. Oswald, To James Heath, Esq.,
St. Paul's Road, Stanhope Terrace,
Camden Town. Notting Hill.

"It is of great importance that I should see you to-night. Robert Oswald died at five o'clock this evening. Please come here at once on receiving this telegram."

"Could it be some conspiracy to get me into the house and murder me!" thought Mr. Heath, as he walked about the room with the telegram in his pocket. "O, nonsense! I need not be afraid of that. They are very respectable people in the house. No, depend upon it, it is either that the mother wants to beg or borrow from me, or that there is some screw loose about the policy of assurance. Curse it! Like my usual luck. But I had better be off there at once. What a curious authoritative way she telegraphs in, though."

He left the house, and, hailing the first hansom he met, was driven raidily to St. Paul's road. A servant opened the hall door before he could knock, and, having asked if he was Mr. Heath, conducted him up stairs to the drawing room. Though it was just 9:30 o'clock, and getting rather dark, no lamp or candle was lighted in the room, and as Mr. Heath entered he could just discern through the deep twilight the figure of a tall woman who was sitting by one of the windows, dressed in black. She rose as he entered and asked him to take a chair which was a few yards from where she was sitting. From the position in which she sat, and the darkness of the room, Mr. Heath could not discern her features very clearly, and to tell the truth he felt exceedingly uncomfortable. He was pretty well case-hardened of course; few men had had more curious experiences, and some of the scenes he had witnessed in the pursuit of his vocation were not a little appalling. But just as one of the first things that is taught to every medical student is that he must disregard the pain which he has to inflict on his patients, so, from the very outset of his career, Mr. Heath had trained himself to be perfectly callous about the feelings and interests of the people with whom he was brought in contact. Still, all the teaching in the world can not make a surgeon insensible to pain which is inflicted on himself and it was just because he was apprehensive that some calamity was about to fall upon him that Mr. Heath felt on the present occasion a sense of fear which almost amounted to terror.

"You have been prompt in responding to my telegram," said the lady in a hard, defiant voice. "My son, as I told you, is dead. You have stripped him of his little property. He died a pauper. You make £10,000 by his death. I have lately lost nearly all that I was worth. I have spent pretty nearly the rest in nursing him through his last illness. I want twenty pounds in ready money to pay his funeral expenses. You are the proper person to give it to me. Do you refuse?"

I dare say that Mr. Heath would gladly have paid twenty pounds, or more, for the relief he experienced when he heard this speech. So it was only a begging appeal after all. "Thank heavens!" he muttered to himself, and for the first time since he heard of Robert Oswald's death he felt really easy in his mind.

"My good madam," he said, in his usual tone of gruff determination, "your son sought me voluntarily. He had ample value for what he sold me. I have nothing more to say on the matter, and I must wish you good-night."

"But I have something more to say to you," said the lady, who rose from her chair at the same time that he did. "Had you given me the twenty pounds I would have been content to let you go in peace. As it is you must hear why you are the proper person to pay for the funeral of my son. Come here; I have something to tell you which you will remember to the last day of your life. See——"

She threw open the folding doors that separated the drawing-room from a bedroom which was brilliantly lighted with candles. On the bed lay the body of Robert Oswald. His mother went round and stood at the far side of the bed, facing Heath, who advanced a little way into the inner room as if he were drawn by a spell.

"Now, sir, she exclaimed, "do you recognize me?"

"I can't say I do, madam," said Heath, whose eyes were fixed on the face of the corpse, and who hardly looked at her.

"Twenty-two years make a difference, no doubt," she said, as she removed a scarf which was tied round her head and let her long auburn hair fall about her shoulders. "Now, Philip Arnott, look at me again and see if you recognize the face of the wife whom you forced to leave you. Look on that bed and see if you recognize your own features in the face of your dead son."

"My son!" exclaimed Heath—or Arnott, as he really was.

"Yes," said his wife, "it is not many days since, by an accident, I found out that you, whom I knew to have ruined him and from whom I tried to save him, were also his father. When you forced me to fly from you twenty-two years ago I found a protector for myself and child. We went to America, where we lived for years as man and wife. In an evil hour we came back to England. God or fate brought your son and you together—the little darling child whom you used to nurse on your lap—the little child who used to pull your whiskers and throw his arms around your neck. You loved him, though you did not love me; but, oh, see—there is the result!"

For a moment Arnott, who was deadly pale, looked in her face and uttered one word, "Alice." Then he looked at the corpse again, and said mechanically, as his eyes were riveted on it: "Bob."

"Yes, Bob and Alice," cried his wife. "You recognize us now; but what is the matter——?"

Philip Arnott was swaying from side to side. Suddenly he fell senseless on the floor. It was many hours before he showed any signs of returning consciousness, but when he did so he was in a state of idiocy, in which condition he remained until he died, about three months afterward. As he had made no will his property was divided under the statute of distributions. I have only to add that Alice Arnott succeeded, as his widow, to her share of the property, and returned to America shortly after his death.—Belgravia.

SMALL-FRUIT CULTURE.

Following Nature's Methods of Manuring and Mulching.

To preserve moisture and coolness in the soil is a prime necessity in small-fruit culture. In my experience I find manure and soil-stirring of decidedly secondary importance. These fruits do not draw hard on those manurial elements which are necessary for full crops of cereals, and they don't require and don't like to be pushed into rapid, succulent, tender growth, like most vegetables. I have, for several years, looked rather to Natures' own process of culture than to any theories of man's device; for these are continually tripping while Nature's growths are everywhere healthful and strong where not interfered with by man or his domestic animals. Nature does not plow except by means of the frost, nor manure except with the leaves and other wastes of growth, and with the slow weatherings of the rocks.

I have been imitating this simple course. The raspberry rows that have been kept mulched for five or six years, mostly with their own prunnings, sheared off in lengths straight enough to lie close and flat, have done admirably well without any tillage, more than now and then here and there to scuffle out incipient weeds, of which there are almost none, and redundant suckers which are rubbed out as soon as they show their noses. Quite a layer of black mold has already accumulated on the surface, and, without any digging or soil-stirring at all, the growth is so strong that Cuthberts become top-heavy, and many canes grow too large to mature well, and I am giving precedence to the trim, erect, clean, well-ripening Marlboro.

I treat strawberry beds quite similarly, using no raw stable manure. I introduce no weed seeds and I take care to grow none of my own. I mulch well before Christmas with tan or saw-dust which, remaining on the top, does not sour but in one year becomes so carbonized as to do no apparent harm if dug into the soil. One bed of Cumberland has not been dug or replanted for eight years, and is now as well set with strong, healthy-looking plants as most others. As soon as practicable after picking is over, the old exhausted plants are chopped out and their runners thinned to eighteen or twenty inches apart. This is heroic work, and seems to leave nothing but devastation, but it is rapidly done, and when the autumn rains come strong, new growth sets in, and I take care that there is no competing growth. The soil is mostly clay, some of it heavy, but this, compact as it gets under this system of little tillage, yields quite as well as any of the mellower loam. This method of culture is well suited for female fruit growers, as there is very little heavy labor attending it, but there is never any lack of something to do, except just in the hottest of the summer and the dead of the winter.—*Cor. —It is claimed to be proven, beyond all doubt, that waters which circulate or stand in leaden pipes or vessels, not only take up particles of lead through mechanical action due to friction, but attack the mental, the result of this being generally lead carbonate. According to the most eminent authorities in this line, minute quantities of lead thus introduced into and accumulating in the system, must rank among the causes of anæmia and defective nutrition in large towns.

—"It can not be too widely known," writes a medical man, "that cream separated by machinery from pure new milk, before it has cooled, is a full substitute for cod liver oil and that if, during the cold weather, those who have delicate constitutions which need concentrated nutrition but who can not overcome the nausea associated with cod-liver oil, will take this description of cream they will find in most cases, immense and lasting benefit. In several hospitals it has already quite superseded the nauseous oil.

—Some remarkable changes have recently been noted by M. Perrotin on the planet Mars. In a letter to the Academie des Sciences, he reports that the tract of land on both sides of the equator, which has been named Lybia, seems to have been submerged by the sea. It was distinctly seen by him two years ago, when it was bounded on two sides by a sea, and on the others by one of the streaks to which M. Schiaparelli gave the name of canals, but now does not exist. A drawing made by him in 1882 shows the same appearance, which leads him to the conclusion that the inundation, if it be such, is periodic.

DOES WEALTH CORRUPT?

Walter Scott's Theory That Saving, Not Getting, Is the Mother of Riches.

Wealth is said to corrupt our species. We do not believe it. Wealth is one of the great civilizers of man. Wealth corrupts when it is suddenly got, or unjustly distributed; when, owing to monopolies or entails, or some other barbarous system, it is prevented from diffusing itself naturally and justly. But where all have an equal chance; where all start nearly even; where all have a certain degree of instruction to begin with; where superior skill and virtue alone give one man an advantage over another, there wealth is an unmixed blessing.

We ought to rejoice that the desire of wealth is so universal and so strong. It keeps the vast machinery of the world going. It has suggested the most beneficent enterprises and the most useful improvements. We owe to it the fact that a man who can earn one dollar a day can be better lodged, better fed, better clothed, better taught, than kings and nobles could five hundred years ago.

Sir Walter Scott truly says that saving, not getting, is the mother of riches. This truth is wonderfully illustrated in the history of some families once poor but now noted for their wealth.

John Jacob Astor had a brother, not so well known as himself, but who possessed in an eminent degree the peculiar characteristic of the family—the art of saving money. It is told of him by an old New Yorker, that intending to operate upon the feelings of an acquaintance of whom he was about to make some purchases, he gave to the son of the latter, who was playing about the store entrance, a bright penny. The trade having been concluded, the thrifty Astor said to the little fellow: "Johnny, you've played mit the penny long enough; give it back to me."

Johnny, much surprised and not a little disheartened, handed over the penny, and Astor, depositing it in his pocket, walked off. He became a very rich man.—N. Y. Ledger.

Enormous Palm Trees.

The huge palm trees on the Saunder's place on San Pedro street have long been a source of admiration to thousands of people. They were there long before the present occupant took possession, and are estimated to be from sixty-five to seventy-five years old. The diameter of the largest is fully four feet and the height over sixty feet, while the bodies of all rise like well-rounded pillars symmetrically formed for forty feet or more to the well proportioned but not wide-spreading tops. Recently Mr. Saunders disposed of three of them to the Southern Pacific Company for ornamentation of their spacious grounds surrounding the Wolfskill station. The work of removing the first of these stately trees has been successfully accomplished, requiring the carrying along of a body of earth ten feet square and six feet deep, attached to and surrounding the roots. The apparatus for removal is similar to that used in transferring buildings, and when the tree was properly placed upon it in an upright position it was moved along without the use of guy ropes to steady it until its place of deposit was reached. A well is situated between where this tree stood and two others known as the twins, and the roots of the trees penetrated the well at a depth of twenty feet or more.—Los Angeles Express.

Curiosities of Plant Life.

In some parts of Nevada is a curious plant called the "Angry tree." It is a native of Australia, and somewhat resembles the century plant. Its name is due to its apparent vexation at being disturbed. When transplanted each separate leaf stands up in a different direction, like quills on a porcupine or hairs on the tail of an angry cat. At such times it gives forth an unpleasant odor, like that of a rattlesnake when teased, and sometimes it is fully an hour before its leaves resume their natural condition. Another curiosity in the plant world is a peculiar kind of weed which grows in the Arkansas valley. It is shaped like a bell, and varies in size from one foot or less in diameter to five or six feet, some specimens being as tall as a man. When ripe these balls snap off their stems and go tumbling over the prairies with every gust of wind. They present a very strange appearance, and in the distance hunters have mistaken them for bisons. Often they come bounding along in hundreds upon the hunters, who are compelled to crowd upon the ground to escape being hurt.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.
